TRANSLATOR’S NOTE

Note that in the text below the line numbers in square brackets refer to the lines in the Greek text; the line numbers without brackets refer to the lines in the translated text. In numbering the lines of the English text, the translator has normally counted a short indented line with the short line above it, so that two short lines count as one line. The stage directions and footnotes have been added by the translator.

In this translation, possessives of words ending in -s are usually indicated in the common way (that is, by adding ‘s (e.g. Zeus and Zeus’s). This convention adds a syllable to the spoken word (the sound -iz). Sometimes, for metrical reasons, this English text indicates such possession in an alternate manner, with a simple apostrophe. This form of the possessive does not add an extra syllable to the spoken name (e.g., Orestes and Orestes’ are both three-syllable words; whereas, Orestes’s has four syllables).

The translator would like to acknowledge the valuable help of M. J. Cropp’s commentary on the play (Aris & Phillips, 1988).

A COMMENT ON THE MYTHOLOGICAL BACKGROUND

Tyndareus, king of Sparta, and his wife, Leda, had four children: twin brothers Castor and Pollux (or Polydeuces) and twin sisters Clytaemnestra and Helen.
However, Zeus was the father of Pollux and Helen, Tyndareus the father of the Castor and Clytaemnestra. When Castor was killed, Zeus allowed Pollux to share his immortality (which he possessed as a son of Zeus) with his dead brother, so that the two of them could alternate between Hades and Olympus. The brothers, called the Dioscuri (“sons of Zeus”) then became two stars in the night sky (the Gemini), an important help for those navigating at sea.

When Helen, daughter of Tyndareus and wife of Menelaus, was abducted by Paris and taken to Troy, Agamemnon, husband of Clytaemnestra, brother of Menelaus, and king of Mycenae, gathered a fleet to sail to Troy. However, before the Greek fleet could get a favourable wind, the gods insisted Agamemnon had to sacrifice his eldest daughter, Iphigeneia. He did so, and the expedition sailed. Ten years later, Agamemnon returned home victorious but was immediately murdered by Aegisthus, his wife’s lover and collaborator (and a cousin of Orestes). Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra took over power in Mycenae. Orestes, son of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra, had earlier been sent away from Mycenae. Electra, Orestes’s sister, remained in Mycenae and was treated badly by her mother and Aegisthus.

Mycenae is the name of the city ruled by Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra. Argos is the name of the land in which the city is located. The inhabitants are called Mycenaeans or Argives. The names are often used interchangeably.

Euripides’s Electra was first performed in Athens c. 420 BC.
DRAMATIS PERSONAE

PEASANT: a poor farmer in the countryside
ELECTRA: daughter of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra.
ORESTES: son of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra, brother of Electra.
PYLADES: a friend of Orestes.
CHORUS: Argive country women.¹
OLD MAN: an old servant of Agamemnon’s.
MESSENGER: one of Orestes’s servants.
CLYTAEMNESTRA: mother of Orestes and Electra.
DIOSCOURI: Castor and Polydeuces, twin brothers of Clytaemnestra.
SERVANTS: attendants for Orestes, Pylades, and Clytaemnestra.

[The scene is set in the countryside of Argos, in front of the Peasant’s hut. It is just before dawn.]

PEASANT
   O this ancient land, these streams of Inachus, the place from where king Agamemnon once set out with a thousand ships on his campaign and sailed away to the land of Troy. He killed king Priam, who ruled in Ilion and seized the famous town of Dardanus.² Then he returned home, back here to Argos, and set up in high temples piles of loot from those barbarians. Yes, over there things went well for him. But then he was killed in his own home by the hand of Aegisthus, Thyestes’ son, thanks to the treachery of his own wife, Clytaemnestra. So he died, leaving behind Tantalus’ ancient sceptre.³ Aegisthus rules this country now. He wed Tyndareus’ daughter, the dead king’s wife. As for those he left at home behind him when he sailed to Troy, his son Orestes and his daughter, too, Electra—well, now, Aegisthus was about to kill Orestes, ¹Note that speeches assigned to the Chorus may be delivered by the entire Chorus, part of the Chorus, or the Chorus Leader, and sometimes a single choral speech or song may be divided up among different members of the Chorus, as a director of a production will determine.

²Ilion is an alternative name for Troy, and Dardanus is the name of a famous ancestor of Priam, king of Troy. Hence, the Trojans were often called Dardanians
but an old servant of his father’s took him and handed him to Strophius to bring up in the land of Phocis. But Electra stayed on in her father’s house. When she reached her young maturity, the suitors came, the foremost ones throughout the land of Greece, seeking marriage. Aegisthus was afraid she’d bear a child to some important man who then might seek revenge for Agamemnon. So he would not give her to a bridegroom, but kept her in his home. Even this choice filled him with fear, in case she might give birth to a noble child in secret. So he planned to kill her. But though she has a savage heart, her mother saved her from Aegisthus’ hands. She’d an excuse for murdering her husband, but she feared that if she killed her children she’d be totally disgraced. And that’s why Aegisthus came up with the following scheme—he offered gold to anyone who’d kill Agamemnon’s son, who’d left the country as an exile, and he gave Electra to me to be my wife. My ancestors were from Mycenae, so in this matter at least I have no need to feel ashamed. My family was a good one but not rich, and that destroys one’s noble ancestry. He gave her to a man who had no power. In that way his fear could be diminished. If some important fellow married her, he might have woken up the sleeping blood of Agamemnon, and then, at some point, justice would have come to seek Aegisthus. But I’ve never had sex with the girl in bed—and Cypris knows I’m right in this—and so Electra’s still a virgin. I’d be ashamed to take the daughter of a wealthy man and violate the girl, when I’m not born her equal. As for unfortunate Orestes, 1Clytaemnestra’s excuse for killing Agamemnon (as we learn later in the play) is the fact that he sacrificed their daughter Iphigeneia in order to enable the Argive fleet to sail to Troy.

2Cypris is a common name for Aphrodite, the goddess of sexual love. The name comes from the goddess’s frequent association with Cyprus.
who's now, according to what people say,
a relative of mine, I'm sorry for him,
if he should ever return to Argos and see his sister's demeaning marriage.
Any man who says I'm just an idiot to bring a young girl here into my home and then not touch her should know he's a fool who measures wisdom by a worthless standard.

[Electra enters from the hut. She is carrying a water jug on her head.]

ELECTRA

O pitch black night, nurse of golden stars,
I walk through you towards the river stream, carrying this jug balanced on my head.
This is not work I am compelled to do,
but I will manifest to all the gods Aegisthus' insolence, and I will send into this great sky my sorrowing cries out to my father. For my own mother, that murderous daughter of Tyndareus,
in her desire to please her husband, has cast me from my home. With Aegisthus she's had other children and considers Orestes and myself of no account inside her house.

PEASANT

You poor wretched girl, why do you help me doing work like this,
carrying out these chores? In earlier days, you were nobly raised. Why do you not stop, especially when I keep saying this to you?

ELECTRA

You're kind to me, and I consider you the equal of the gods in that. For now, when I'm in trouble, you don't demean me.
When human beings discover someone there to soothe their miseries, as I have you, then Fate is doing something good to them.
So I should help you carry out the work and give you some relief, to the extent my strength permits, without you asking me, so you can bear the load more easily.
There’s work enough for you to do outside.
I should take care of things within the house.
It’s nice when someone working out of doors comes back inside and finds things organized.

PEASANT
Well, if you think you should do it, then go.
The spring is no great distance from the house.
Once daylight comes, I’ll drive the oxen out, go to the farmlands, and then sow the fields.
No matter how much he may mention gods, without hard work a lazy man can never gather up all the things he needs to live.

[Electra leaves for the spring, and the Peasant goes back into the house. Enter Orestes and Pylades, with two servants.]

ORESTES
Among all men, Pylades, I think of you as a loving host, foremost in my trust.¹
For you’re the only one of all my friends who has dealt honourably with Orestes, as I’ve been coping with these wretched things I’ve had to put up with from Aegisthus, who killed my father . . . he and my mother,
that destructive woman. I’ve come here,
from god’s mysterious shrine to Argive lands,
to avenge the killing of my father,
by murdering the ones who butchered him.
Last night I visited my father’s tomb, where I wept and started sacrificing by cutting off a lock of hair. And then, on the altar I made an offering of blood from a sheep I slaughtered. But the tyrants who control this land don’t know I’m here.
I’ve not set foot within the city walls.
No. I’ve come to these fields near the border for two reasons which act on me as one—so I may run off to a different land if someone sees me and knows who I am and to find my sister, who’s living here,

¹Pylades was the son of Strophius, king of Phocis, and a cousin of Orestes.
so they say, joined in marriage to a man, no virgin any more. I could meet her, make her my accomplice in the murder, and in this way get clear information about what’s happening inside the walls. But now that Dawn is raising her bright eyes, let’s move aside to some place off the path. We’ll see a ploughman or some servant woman and ask them if my sister lives near here. In fact, I can see a household servant— her shaven head is carrying a water jug.¹

Let’s sit and ask this female slave some questions, Pylades, and see if we can get some word about the business which has brought us here.

[Orestes and Pylades move back. Electra enters, returning from the spring. She does not see them at first and starts to go through her ritual of mourning.]

ELECTRA

You must step quickly now—it’s time to move—keep going, lamenting as you go. Alas for me! Yes, for me! I am Agamemnon’s child, born from Clytemnestra, Tyndareus’ hateful daughter. Miserable Electra—that’s the name the citizens have given me. Alas, alas! My wretched work, this way of life that I detest! O my father, Agamemnon, you now lie in Hades, murdered by Aegisthus and your wife.

Come now, raise the same lament, seize the joy of prolonged weeping.

You must step quickly now—it’s time to move—keep going, lamenting as you go. Alas for me! Yes, for me! O my poor brother, in what town, ¹The shaven head may be a token of mourning or a sign of Electra’s low status now or both.

to what household have you wandered, abandoning your abject sister to such painful circumstance in her paternal home? Come to me, in my unhappy wretchedness.
Be my deliverer from pain—
O Zeus, Zeus—be an avenger for my father, and the hateful shedding of his blood,
once you set your roaming foot in Argos.

Take this water pitcher from my head and set it down, so I may wail my night laments, cries for my father, wild shrieks, a song of death, your death, my father. For you beneath the earth, I cry out chants of sorrow—day after day
I keep up this constant grieving, tearing my dear skin with nails, hand beating my shaven head—
all this because you're dead.

Ah yes, mutilate your face, and, just as a swan sings out beside the streaming river, crying to its beloved father who died ensnared within the web of a deceitful net, so I cry out for you, unhappy father, your body soaking in that final bath, your most pitiful couch of death.¹

Alas for me . . . alas for me!
That bitter axe that hacked you, father, the bitter scheme of your return from Troy!
Your wife never welcomed you with a victor’s crown or garland.
No. Instead she gave you up to that disgraceful mutilation

¹Agamemnon was killed in his bath, trapped under his cloak, as if under a hunting net.
by Aegisthus' two-edged sword and got herself a treacherous mate.

[Enter the Chorus of Argive women.]

CHORUS
O Electra, daughter of Agamemnon,
I've come here to your rural dwelling place to tell you a milk-drinking man has come,
one of those who walk the mountains.
He's travelled from Mycenae and says the Argives have proclaimed a sacrifice two days from now, and every young bride has to go to Hera's shrine in the procession.

ELECTRA
My sad heart is beating fast, my friends, but not for festive ornaments or necklaces made out of gold.
I won't stand with the Argive girls in choruses or beat my foot
as I whirl in the dance.
I pass my nights in tears—
in my unhappiness my care day after day is with my tears.
See if this filthy hair and tattered clothes suit Agamemnon's royal child or Troy, which bears the memory of how my father seized the place.

CHORUS
The goddess is great. So come, borrow thick woven clothes from me and put them on, with gold as well, graceful ornaments—to favour me.
Do you think that with your tears you can control your enemies if you have no respect for gods?
My child, you'll find yourself a gentler life
by honouring the gods with prayers, and not with sorrowful laments.
ELECTRA

The gods pay no attention to the cries of this ill-fated girl or to the murder of my father all that time ago. Alas for that slaughtered man and for the wanderer still alive dwelling somewhere in a foreign land, a wretched vagabond at a slave’s hearth, son of such a celebrated father. And I am living in a peasant’s home, wasting my soul up on the mountain tops, in exile from my father’s house. My mother, married to another man, lives in a bed stained with his blood.

CHORUS

Your mother’s sister, Helen, brought such grief to the Greeks and to your house, as well.

[Orestes and Pylades begin to move forward. Electra catches sight of them.]

ELECTRA

Alas, women, I must end my lamentation. Some strangers lurking behind the altar near the house are moving out of hiding. Let’s be off—run from these trouble makers. You take the path, and I’ll go in the house.

ORESTES

Stay here, poor girl! Don’t fear my hand.

ELECTRA

O Phoebus Apollo, I entreat you—do not let me die!

ORESTES

And grant that I cut down others I hate much more than you.

ELECTRA

Leave now! Don’t put your hands on those you should not touch.
ORESTES
There's no one I have more right to touch.

ELECTRA
Then why wait beside my house in ambush, with your sword drawn?

ORESTES
Stay here and listen. Soon you will agree with me.

ELECTRA
I'll stand here. I'm yours, anyway, since you're the stronger.

ORESTES
I've come to bring you news about your brother.

ELECTRA
Dearest of friends—is he alive or dead?

ORESTES
Alive. I'd like you to have good news first.

ELECTRA
My you find happiness as your reward for those most welcome words.

ORESTES
That's a blessing I'd like to give to both of us together.

ELECTRA
My unhappy brother—in what country does he spend his wretched exile?

ORESTES
He drifts around, not settling for a single city's customs.

ELECTRA
He's not lacking what he needs each day?
ORESTES
No, that he has. But a man in exile is truly powerless.

ELECTRA What’s the message you’ve come here to bring from him?

ORESTES I’m here to see if you’re alive and, if you are, what your life is like.

ELECTRA Surely you can see,
first of all, how my body’s shrivelled?

ORESTES So worn with pain it makes me pity you.

ELECTRA And my hair cut off, shorn with a razor?

ORESTES Perhaps your dead father and your brother are tearing at you.

ELECTRA Alas! Who is there whom I love more than those two men?

ORESTES Ah yes, and what do you think you are to your own brother?

ELECTRA He is not here,
and so not present as my friend.

ORESTES Why live here,
so distant from the city?
ELECTRA

ELECTRA
I’m married—
it’s a deadly state.

ORESTES
I pity your brother.
Did you marry someone from Mycenae?

ELECTRA
No one my father ever hoped to give me.

ORESTES
Tell me. I’ll listen and inform your brother. [250]

ELECTRA
I live in his house, far from the city.

ORESTES
This is a house fit for a ditch digger or some herdsman.

ELECTRA
He’s poor but decent,
and he respects me.

ORESTES
Your husband’s respect—
what does that mean?

ELECTRA
Never once has he dared 300 to fondle me in bed.

ORESTES
Does he hold back from some religious scruple, or does he think you are not worthy of him?

ELECTRA
No. He believes it is not right to insult my ancestors.
ORESTES
But how could he not be overjoyed at making such a marriage?

ELECTRA
Well, stranger, he thinks the person who gave me away had no right to do it.

ORESTES
I understand.
He fears that someday he’ll be punished by Orestes.

ELECTRA
He is afraid of that,
but he’s a virtuous man, as well.

ORESTES
Ah yes, you’ve been talking of a noble man who must be treated well.

ELECTRA
Yes, if the man who’s far away from here right now comes back.

ORESTES
And your mother, the one who bore you, how did she take this?

ELECTRA
Women give their love to their husbands, stranger, not their children.

ORESTES
Why did Aegisthus shame you in this way?

ELECTRA
By giving me to such a man, he made sure any children I bore would have no power.
ORESTES
Clearly so that you would not have children who could take revenge?

ELECTRA
Yes, that’s his plan.
I hope he’ll have to pay me back for that!

ORESTES
You’re a virgin—does your mother’s husband know?

ELECTRA
No. We hide that from him with our silence.

ORESTES
These women listening to what we’re saying are friends of yours?

ELECTRA
Yes. They’ll keep well concealed my words and yours.

ORESTES
If he came to Argos
what could Orestes do in all of this?

ELECTRA
You have to ask? What a shameful question!
Isn’t now a crucial time?

ORESTES
If he comes,
how should he kill his father’s murderers?

ELECTRA
By daring what my father’s enemies dared do to him.

ORESTES
And would you dare
to help him kill your mother?
ELECTRA

Yes, I would—
with the very axe that killed our father!

ORESTES

Shall I tell him this? Are you quite certain? [280]

ELECTRA

Once I’ve shed my mother’s blood, let me die!

ORESTES

Ah, if only Orestes were close by and could hear this!

ELECTRA

Stranger, if I saw him,
I would not know him. 340

ORESTES

That’s not surprising.
When he went away, you were so young.

ELECTRA

Only one of my friends would recognize him.

ORESTES

The man they say saved him from being killed by stealing him away?

ELECTRA

Yes. An old man—
my father’s servant long ago.

ORESTES

Your father—
when he died, did he get a burial tomb?

ELECTRA

Once he’d been thrown out of the house, he found what he could find.

ORESTES

Alas! Those words of yours . . . [290]
Awareness of pain, even of a stranger, 350 gnaws away at men. But you must tell me.
Once I have listened, I can tell your brother the unhappy story he has to hear.
Those with no knowledge cannot sympathize, for only those who know feel pity. Still, knowing too much can put the wise at risk.

CHORUS
My heart’s desires are the same as his.
Out here, far from the city, I don’t know the troubles there. Now I want to hear them.

ELECTRA
I will speak out, if that’s acceptable—for it’s appropriate to talk with friends about the burden of my situation and my father’s. And I beg you, stranger, since you’re the one who prompted me to speak,
tell Orestes of our troubles, mine and his.
First of all, there’s the sort of clothes I wear, kept here in a stall, weighed down with filth.
Then there’s the kind of house I’m living in,
now I’ve been thrown out of my royal home.
I have to work hard at the loom myself to make my clothes or else I’d have to go wearing nothing at all, just do without, bringing water from the springs all by myself,
with no share in the ritual festivals,
no place in the dance. Since I’m a virgin,
I keep married women at a distance.
I felt shamed by Castor, who courted me,
his relative, before he joined the gods.
Meanwhile my mother sits there on her throne,
with loot from Phrygia and Asian slaves,
my father’s plunder, standing by her chair,
their Trojan dresses pinned with golden brooches.¹
My father’s blood still stains the palace walls—
it’s rotted black—while the man who killed him climbs in my father’s chariot and drives out, proud to brandish in his blood-stained hands
the very sceptre that my father used

¹Phrygia is a region in Asia Minor near Troy. The terms Phrygian and Trojan are often used interchangeably. to command the Greeks. Agamemnon’s grave has not been honoured. It’s had no libations, no myrtle branch—its altar is unadorned. And this splendid husband of my mother, so they say, when he’s soaking wet with drink, jumps on the grave and starts throwing pebbles at the stone memorial to my father, and dares to cry out words like this against us: “Where’s your son Orestes? Is he present to act with honour and defend your tomb?” And so Orestes in his absence is insulted. So I beg you, stranger, take back this news. Many are summoning him—I speak for them—my hands and tongue, my grief-stricken heart, my shaven head, and Agamemnon, too. It would be disgraceful if his father could destroy the Phrygians and yet he, one against one, could not destroy a man, when he is young and from a nobler father.

[Enter the Peasant, returning from the fields.]

CHORUS
Look! I see someone—I mean your husband. He’s left his work. He’s coming to the house.

PEASANT
Hold on. Who are these strangers I see there by the door? And why have they come here, to a farmer’s gate? What do they want from me? It’s shameful for a woman to be standing with young men.

ELECTRA
My dear friend, don’t suspect me. You’ll hear what’s going on. These strangers have come here from Orestes—they’re messengers with news for me. But forgive him, strangers, for those words he said.

PEASANT
What are they saying? Is the man still gazing at the sunlight?
ELECTRA
That's what they say, and I believe their news.

PEASANT
Does he still recall your father's troubles and your own?

ELECTRA
We can hope about those things, but a man in exile has no power.

PEASANT
What message from Orestes did they bring when they came here?

ELECTRA
He sent them out as spies to look into my troubles.

PEASANT
They're seeing some, and I suppose you're telling them the rest.

ELECTRA
There's very little they don't know about.

PEASANT
Surely we should have opened up our doors long before this point.

[The Peasant turns to Orestes and Pylades.]

Go inside the house.
In exchange for your good news, you'll find all the hospitality my house affords.
You servants, take the stuff inside the house.
Do not refuse me—you are friends of ours and you've come from someone who's a friend.
Even if I'm poor, I will not behave like someone with an ill-bred character.

ORESTES [to Electra]
By the gods, is this the man pretending to be married because he does not wish to bring dishonour to Orestes?

ELECTRA

He is—he’s the one who in my miserable state they call my husband.

ORESTES

Well, nothing is precise when it comes to how a man is valued—men’s natures are confusing. Before this, I’ve seen a man worth nothing, yet he had a noble father; I’ve known evil parents with outstanding children, seen famine in a rich man’s mind and a great spirit in a poor man’s body. So how can we sort out these things and judge correctly?
By riches? That would be a wretched test.
By those who have nothing? But poverty is a disease. Through need it teaches men to act in evil ways. So should I turn to warfare? But when facing hostile spears, who can testify which men are virtuous?
Best to dismiss such things, leave them to chance.
This man is not great among the Argives, nor puffed up by his family’s reputation.
He’s one of the crowd, yet has proved himself an excellent man. So stop your foolishness, those of you who keep wandering around full of misguided ways of measuring worth.
Why not judge how valuable men are by their behaviour and their company?
Men like this one govern homes and cities well, while those with muscles and with vacant minds are mere decorations in the market place.
In fights with spears the strong arm holds its ground no better than the weak one does—such things depend upon man’s nature and his courage.
But because the man who is both absent and yet present here is worthy of it—I mean Agamemnon’s son, for whose sake we have come—let us accept the lodging in this home. You slaves, go inside the house.
May a poor but willing man act as my host rather than a man with wealth. I applaud how this one has received me in his home, although I would have preferred your brother might welcome me into a prosperous and successful house. But perhaps he’ll come. I place no trust in human prophecies, but the oracles of Loxias are strong.

[Chorus]

CHORUS

Now, Electra, our hearts are warm with joy—more than they have been before. Your fortunes may perhaps advance, although that’s difficult, and end up resting in a better place.

ELECTRA [to the Peasant]

Reckless man, you know how poor your house is—why did you offer your hospitality to people so much greater than yourself?

PEASANT

What’s wrong? If they’re as well bred as they seem, won’t they be just as happy with small men as with the great?

ELECTRA

Well, you are one of the small. But since you’ve now committed this mistake, go to that dear old servant of my father’s. He’s been expelled from town and tends his flocks by the Tanaus river, which cuts a line between lands of Argos and of Sparta. Tell him this—now these people have arrived, he must come and provide our guests some food. He’ll be happy to do that and to offer prayers up to the gods when he finds out the child he rescued once is still alive. From my mother and my ancestral home

1Loxias is another name for Apollo, the god whose shrine Orestes consults before coming to Argos (as he mentions at line 115 above). We do not know the text of the oracle (although we later learn it encouraged him to commit the revenge murders), and Electra is, one assumes, at this point ignorant of Orestes’s visit to the shrine.
we’d get nothing—we’d bring them bitter news
if that cruel-hearted woman were to learn Orestes is still living.

PEASANT

All right then,
I’ll take that message to the old man,
if that’s what you think. But you should go inside the house as soon as possible to get things ready there. If she wants to, surely a woman can find many things to make into a meal. Within the house there’s still enough to fill them up with food for at least one day. It’s at times like this, when I have no idea how to manage,
I think of the great power money has for giving things to strangers and paying to save someone whenever he falls sick.
The meals we need each day don’t come to much,
for all men, once they have eaten their fill,
feel much the same, whether rich or poor.

[The Peasant and Electra move into the house, leaving the Chorus alone on stage.]

CHORUS

You famous ships which once sailed off to Troy to the beat of countless oars, leading Nereïds in their dance, while flute-loving dolphins leapt and rolled around your dark-nosed prows, accompanying Achilles, Thetis’ son, whose feet had such a nimble spring,
and Agamemnon, too, off to Troy,
to the banks of the river Simois.¹

Leaving Euboea’s headland points, Nereïds carried from Hephaestus’ forge his labours on the golden shield and armour, up to Pelion, along the wooded slopes of sacred Ossa, where the nymphs keep watch, and searched those maidens out,

¹Nereïds, daughters of the minor sea god Nereus, were nymphs of the sea. Achilles’s divine mother, Thetis, was a nereid.
in places the old horseman trained sea-dwelling Thetis’ son [450] to be a shining light for Hellas, and swift runner for the sons of Atreus.¹

I heard from a man who’d come from Troy and reached the harbour in Nauplia that on the circle of your splendid shield, O son of Thetis, were these images, so terrifying to the Phrygians—
on the rim around the edge was Perseus in his flying sandals holding up above the sea
the Gorgon’s head and severed throat, accompanied by Zeus’s messenger
Hermes, Maia’s country child.²

In the centre of the shield the circle of the sun blazed out with his team of winged horses.
Dancing stars shone in the heavens,
the Pleiades and Hyades,
a fearful sight for Hector’s eyes.
On the helmet made of hammered gold sphinxes in their talons clutched their prey seduced by song, and on the breastplate breathing fire a lioness with claws raced away eying the young horse of Pirene.³

And on his murderous sword
four horses galloped—above their backs

¹These lines refer to the centaur Chiron, half man and half horse, who in the region described educated Achilles and other heroes. Pelion and Ossa are two famous mountains. Hephaestus is the god who made Achilles’s divine armour. These lines appear to suggest that Nereids carried the divine armour made by Hephaestus to Achilles before he set off to Troy and that at the time he was still being educated by Chiron in the mountains.

²Perseus was the hero who killed Medusa, the most ferocious of the Gorgons (her face turned men to stone). Hermes, divine son of Zeus and Maia, assisted Perseus in the exploit. He is called a “country child” because he is associated with farming and hunting.

³This is a reference to the monster Chimaera, a fire-breathing lioness with a goat’s body and head growing out of its back. The “young horse of Pirene” is a reference to Pegasus, the winged horse ridden by the hero Bellerophon, who killed the Chimaera. The mention of Hector is a reminder that he had to face Achilles’s shield in his final and fatal encounter with Achilles (described in Book 22 of the Iliad).
rose billowing black clouds of dust. Evil-minded daughter of Tyndareus, your bed mate killed the king of spear-bearing warriors like these. And for that death the heavenly gods will one day pay you back with death.¹ Yes, one day I will see your blood, death spurts pulsing from your throat, sliced through by a sword of iron.

[Enter the Old Man. Electra comes out of the house during his speech.]

OLD MAN
So where is she? Where is my young lady, my mistress—daughter of the man I raised, king Agamemnon? How steep this path is to where she lives for a decrepit old man going up this hill on foot! Still, they’re my friends, so I must drag myself with my bent back and tottering legs up here. O my daughter, now I can see you there before the house. I’ve come bringing here from my own livestock a newborn lamb taken from its mother, garlands, cheeses I’ve lifted from the press, and this ancient treasure from Dionysus—it smells so rich! There’s not much of it, but still it’s sweet to add a cup of this to a weaker drink. Let someone take these inside the house and give them to the guests. I want to use some cloth or piece of clothing to wipe my eyes—they are full of tears.

ELECTRA
Why are your eyes so soaking wet, old man? Am I reminding you of our troubles after all this time? Or are you grieving about Orestes in his wretched exile and about my father, whom you once held in your arms and raised. But that care of yours was no help to you or to your family.

¹The phrase “evil minded daughter of Tyndareus” is a reference to Clytaemnestra.
OLD MAN

That’s right—

it didn’t help us. But still, there’s one thing
I could not bear, so I went to his tomb, a detour on the road. I was alone, so I lay down and wept. I opened up the sack of wine I’m bringing for the guests, poured a libation, and spread out there some myrtle sprigs around the monument.
But then I saw an offering on the altar,
a black-fleeced sheep—there was blood as well,
shed not long before, and some sliced off curls, locks of yellow hair. My child, I wondered what man would ever dare approach that tomb.
It surely wasn’t any man from Argos.
Perhaps your brother has come back somehow,
in secret, and as he came, paid tribute to his father’s grave. You should examine the lock of hair, set it against your own—see if the colour of the severed curls matches your own. Those sharing common blood from the same father will by nature have many features which are very much alike.

ELECTRA

What you’ve said, old man, does not make much sense, if you think my brother, a courageous man, would sneak into this country in secret
because he is fearful of Aegisthus.
And how can two locks of hair look alike, when one comes from a well-bred man and grew in wrestling schools, whereas the other one was shaped by woman’s combing? That’s unlikely.
Old man, you could find hair which looked alike on many people whose family blood is not the same at all.

OLD MAN

Then stand in the footprint, my child, and see if the impression there is the same size as your foot.

ELECTRA

How could a foot make any imprint on such stony ground?
And even if it could, a brother’s print would not match his sister’s foot in size.
The man’s is bigger.

OLD MAN
If your brother’s come,
Isn’t there a piece of weaving from your loom
By which you might know his identity?
What about the clothing he was wearing
When I rescued him from death?

ELECTRA
Don’t you realize
That at the time Orestes left this land
I was still young? And if I’d made his clothes
When he was just a child, how could he have
The same ones now, unless the robes he wore Increased in size as his body grew? No.
Either some stranger, pitying the grave, cut his hair, or some Argive tricked the guard.¹

OLD MAN
Where are your guests? I’d like to see them
And ask about your brother.

[Orestes and Pylades come out of the house.]

ELECTRA
Here they are—in a rush to get outside.

OLD MAN
They’re well born,
But that may be misleading. Many men
Of noble parentage are a bad lot.
But still I’ll say welcome to these strangers.

ORESTES
Welcome to you, old man. So, Electra,

¹This line is corrupt and makes little sense in the Greek. The words “some Argive tricked the guard” have been put in to make sense of Electra’s words, turning the line into a suggestion that some citizen may have eluded Aegisthus’s sentries and paid a tribute to Agamemnon.
ELECTRA

this ancient remnant of a man—to whom among your friends does he belong?

ELECTRA

Stranger,
this man is the one who raised my father.

ORESTES

What are you saying? Is this the man who stole away your brother?

ELECTRA

He’s the one who rescued him, if he’s still alive.

ORESTES

Wait!
Why is he inspecting me, as if checking some clear mark stamped on a piece of silver? Is he comparing me with someone else?

ELECTRA

It could be he’s happy looking at you as someone who’s a comrade of Orestes.

ORESTES

Well, yes, Orestes is a friend of mine, but why’s he going in circles round me?

ELECTRA

Stranger, as I watch him, I’m surprised as well.

OLD MAN

O my daughter Electra, my lady—pray to the gods.

ELECTRA

What should I pray for, something here or something far away?

OLD MAN

To get yourself a treasure which you love, something the god is making manifest.
ELECTRA

Watch this then. I’m summoning the gods. Is that what you mean, old man?

OLD MAN

Now, my child, look at this man, the one you love the most.

ELECTRA

I’ve been watching you a long time now to see if your mind is working as it should.

OLD MAN

I’m not thinking straight if I see your brother?

ELECTRA

What are you talking about, old man, making such an unexpected claim?

OLD MAN

I’m looking at Orestes, Agamemnon’s son.

ELECTRA

What mark do you see which will convince me?

OLD MAN

A scar along his eyebrow. He fell one day and drew blood. He was on his father’s land chasing down a fawn with you.

ELECTRA

What are you saying? I do see the mark left by that fall. . . .

OLD MAN

Then why delay embracing the one you love the most?

ELECTRA

No. I’ll no longer hesitate—my heart has been won over by that scar of yours.

[Electra moves over to Orestes and they embrace.]
ELECTRA

You’ve appeared at last. I’m holding you . . .
   beyond my hopes.

ORESTES

After all this time,
   I’m embracing you.

ELECTRA

I never expected this.

ORESTES

This was something I, too, could not hope for.

ELECTRA

Are you really him?

ORESTES

Yes. Your sole ally.

If in my net I can catch the prey I’m after . . .
   But I’m confident. For if wrongful acts triumph over justice, then no longer should we put any of our faith in gods.

CHORUS

You’ve come, ah, you’ve come,
   this day we’ve waited for all these years.
   You’ve shone out and lit a beacon for the city, the man who long ago went out in exile from his father’s house to roam around in misery.
   Now a god, my friend, some god brings victory. Lift up your hands, lift up your words, send prayers up to the gods for your success, good fortune for your brother,
   as he goes in the city.

710

ORESTES

Well, I’ve had the loving joys of welcome.
   In time I’ll give them back to you again.
   You, old man, you’ve come at a good time.
   Tell me this—what should I do to repay my father’s murderer and my mother, his partner in this sacrilegious marriage?
Do I have any friends who'll help in Argos?
Or are they all gone, just like my fortune?
Who can I make my ally? Do we meet during daylight or at night? What pathway do I take to fight against my enemies?

OLD MAN
My child, when times are bad one has no friends.
It's a rare benefit to find someone who'll share with you the good times and the bad.
But since, as far as your friends can see,
you and the foundations of your house have been destroyed completely, you've left them no hope at all. So give me your attention—you should realize that all you really have to win back your father's home and city are your own two hands and some good fortune.

ORESTES
What then should I do to succeed in this?

OLD MAN
Kill Thyestes' son and your own mother.

ORESTES
That's the crown of victory I'm after.
But how am I to get my hands on it?

OLD MAN
Well, even if you wanted to attempt it, don't go inside the walls.

ORESTES
Is he well supplied with bodyguards and regular spearmen?

OLD MAN
Yes, he is.
He's afraid of you and does not sleep well.

ORESTES
Well, old man, you must give me some advice about what happens next.
OLD MAN

Then you should listen—
an idea has just occurred to me.

ORESTES

I hope you have come up with something good which I can understand.

OLD MAN

On my way here
I saw Aegisthus.

ORESTES

I’m listening to you.
Where was he?

OLD MAN

In the fields close to his stables.

ORESTES

What was he doing? I can see some hope emerging from our desperate situation.

OLD MAN

He was setting up a banquet for the nymphs—that’s what it seemed to me.

ORESTES

But was it for a child he’s raising or for some new birth?¹

OLD MAN

I only know one thing—there was an ox.
He was preparing it for sacrifice.

ORESTES

How many men did he have there with him?
Or was he by himself with his attendants?

OLD MAN

No Argives, only a group of servants.

¹The nymphs, minor country goddesses, were associated with physical health, including at childbirth and during childhood.
ORESTES
Old man, is there anybody with him who will recognize me if he sees us?

OLD MAN
No.
They are slaves who’ve never set eyes on you.

ORESTES
If we prevail, will they be on our side?

OLD MAN
Yes. That’s what slaves are like. You’re lucky.

ORESTES
How do I get close to him?

OLD MAN
You should walk
where he can see you as he sacrifices.

ORESTES
So apparently his fields are by the road?

OLD MAN
Yes. When he catches sight of you from there, he’ll summon you to join the feast.

ORESTES
With god’s will,
I’ll make a bitter fellow banqueter.

OLD MAN
From then on you must sort things out yourself, whatever happens.

ORESTES
That’s excellent advice.
What about my mother? Where is she?

OLD MAN
In Argos. She’ll join her husband at the feast.
ORESTES
Why did my mother not leave with her husband?

OLD MAN
She stayed behind because she was afraid the citizens would criticize her.

ORESTES
I see.
She knows the city is suspicious of her.

OLD MAN
That’s right. People hate a profane woman.

ORESTES
How do I kill them both at the same time?

ELECTRA
I’ll set up mother’s murder on my own.

ORESTES
Good fortune will bring us success in this.

ELECTRA
Let the old man give both of us some help.

OLD MAN
All right. But how will you devise a way to kill your mother?

ELECTRA
Old man, you must go and report this news to Clytaemnestra—say I have given birth—and to a son.

OLD MAN
Born some time ago or in the last few days?

ELECTRA
Before my lying in, ten days ago. ¹

¹The “lying in,” Cropp notes, was a period immediately after childbirth in which the mother was kept in seclusion to avoid contamination.
OLD MAN
   How does this advance your mother’s murder?

ELECTRA
   When she finds out I’ve been through birthing pains, she’ll come here.

OLD MAN
   Why would she do that? My child, do you think she cares for you?

ELECTRA
   Yes. And she’ll weep because my child is born so common.

OLD MAN
   Perhaps. But come back to the point of what you’re saying.

ELECTRA
   If she comes, then it’s clear that she will die. [660]

OLD MAN
   So she comes to your house, right to the door. . . .

ELECTRA
   Well, it won’t take much for her to turn aside and go to Hades, will it?

OLD MAN
   Once I see that, 800 then let me die!

ELECTRA
   But first of all, old man, you must lead my brother . . . .

OLD MAN
   . . . to where Aegisthus is now offering gods his sacrifice.

ELECTRA
   Then go to my mother. Tell her my news.
OLD MAN
   I'll do it so the very words will seem as if they came from your own mouth.

ELECTRA [to Orestes]
   Now it’s up to you. You’ve drawn first lot in this bloody slaughter.

ORESTES
   Then I'll be off,
   if someone will conduct me to the road.

OLD MAN
   I'll be happy to take you there myself.

[Orestes, Electra, Pylades, and the Old Man pause to make a brief prayer together.]

ORESTES
   O Father Zeus, scatter my enemies.

ELECTRA
   Pity us—we’ve suffered pitifully.

OLD MAN
   Yes, have pity on them, your descendants.

ELECTRA
   And Hera, who rules Mycenae’s altars.

ORESTES
   Give us victory, if what we seek is just.

OLD MAN
   Yes, give them justice to avenge their father.

ORESTES
   You, too, father, living beneath the earth through an unholy slaughter.

ELECTRA
   And lady Earth,
   to whom I stretch my hands.
OLD MAN Defend these two.
Defend these children whom you love the most. 820

ORESTES Come now, bringing all the dead as allies. [680]

ELECTRA Those who in that war and by your side destroyed the Phrygians.

OLD MAN And all those who hate the sacrilegious and profane.

ELECTRA Are you listening, those of you who suffered such terrors at the hand of my own mother?

OLD MAN Your father hears it all, I know. Time to go.

ELECTRA [to Orestes] He knows everything. You must be a man.¹
And I'll tell you this—Aegisthus has to die.
If in the struggle with him you fall dead, then I die as well. Do not think of me as still alive. I'll take my two-edged sword and slice into my heart. I'll go inside and get things ready. If you send good news the whole house will ring with cries of triumph.
But if you die, things will be different.
These are my words to you.

ORESTES I understand.

[Orestes, Pylades, the Old Man, and the attendants leave. Electra turns to face the Chorus.]

¹There is some confusion and argument about the allocation and position of this line, which in the Greek comes after this speech of Electra’s and is divided between Orestes and Electra. I have followed Cropp’s suggestion and given the entire line to Electra at the beginning of her speech to Orestes.
ELECTRA

You women,
give a good shout to signal this encounter. I'll be ready waiting, gripping a sword. If I'm defeated, I will never submit, surrendering to my enemies the right to violate my body.

[Electra goes back into the house.]

CHORUS

Among our ancient stories, there remains a tale how Pan, keeper of the countryside, breathing sweet-toned music on his harmonious pipes, once led a golden lamb with the fairest fleece of all from its tender mother in the hills of Argos. Standing on the platform stone a herald with a loud voice cried, "Assemble now, you Mycenaeans, move into assembly and see there the terrifying and marvellous things belonging to your blessed kings." So choruses gave out their tributes honouring the House of Atreus.

Altars of hammerd gold were dressed, while in the city fires blazed with Argive sacrifice. A flute, the Muses’ servant, piped graceful notes, and joyful melodies arose in honour of the golden lamb, which now belonged to Thyestes. For he had secretly seduced in bed the well-loved wife of Atreus, taken the wondrous beast back home, and, going to the assembly, had declared the horned sheep with the fleece of gold was in his palace and belonged to him.
But then, at that very moment, Zeus changed the paths of all the shining stars, the radiant glory of the sun, and dawn’s bright shining face. [730] Across the western reaches of the sky he drove hot flames from heaven. Rain clouds moved up to the north, so Ammon’s lands were dry—all withered up, deprived by Zeus of his most lovely showers of rain.¹

People speak about these tales, but in such things my faith is small—that the sun’s hot throne of gold turned round to punish human beings in a cause involving mortal men. But tales which terrify mankind are profitable and serve the gods. [740] But you were not concerned with them the day you killed your husband, you sister of such glorious brothers.²

Wait! Hold on! Did you hear a shout, my friends? Or has some vain notion overtaken me, like Zeus’s rumbling underneath the ground? Look, breezes are stirring—that’s a sign. My lady, come out of the house! Electra! [750]

¹Thyestes and Atreus were brothers. Intending to offer a sacrifice to the goddess Artemis, Atreus searched his flock for the finest lamb and discovered one with a golden fleece. Since he did not wish to sacrifice such a rare treasure, he gave the animal to his wife, Aerope, for safe keeping. She, however, gave it to Thyestes, her secret lover. Thyestes and Atreus then agreed that whoever had the lamb would be king of Mycenae. Thyestes produced the lamb and became king. He said he would give back the throne if the sun moved backwards in the sky. Zeus brought about that cosmic event, and Atreus regained the kingship. At that point he banished Thyestes. Once he learned of the affair between his wife and Thyestes, Atreus took his revenge by killing Thyestes’s sons and serving them up as food to their father at a banquet (ostensibly a feast to celebrate the reconciliation of the two brothers). Thyestes then raped his own daughter Pelopia in order to produce a child who would avenge the horrific banquet. That child was Aegisthus, the killer of Agamemnon. Euripides does not dwell on the details of the Thyestean Feast. The phrase “Ammon’s land” is a reference to North Africa, where Ammon’s shrine was located.

²Clytaemnestra’s “glorious brothers” are Castor and Polydeuces.
ELECTRA

What is it, my friends? How goes our struggle?
What’s happening?

CHORUS

All I know is this—
I heard a scream of someone being killed.

ELECTRA

I heard it, too. It came from far away.

CHORUS

Yes, a long way off, but it was distinct.

ELECTRA

Was it someone from Argos groaning, or one of my friends?

CHORUS

I’ve no idea.
People are shouting. Things are all confused.

ELECTRA

What you say means my death. Why hesitate?

CHORUS

Hold on until you clearly know your fate.

ELECTRA

No. We’re beaten. Where are the messengers?

CHORUS

They’ll be here. It’s no trivial matter to assassinate a king.

MESSENGER

O you victorious daughters of Mycenae,
I can report to all Orestes’ friends that he has triumphed, and now Aegisthus, Agamemnon’s murderer, has fallen.
But we must offer prayers to the gods.
ELECTRA
Who are you? How can I trust what you’ve just said?

MESSENGER
Don’t you know me by sight—your brother’s servant?

ELECTRA
You best of friends! I was too full of fear to recognize your face. But now I know you. What are you saying? Has that hateful man, my father’s murderer, been killed?

MESSENGER
He’s dead.
I’ve given you the same report twice now. Obviously you like the sound of it.

ELECTRA
O you gods, and all-seeing Justice, you’ve come at last. How did Orestes kill Thyestes’ son? What was the murder like? I want to know.

MESSENGER
After we’d left this house, we walked along the two-tracked wagon path to where Mycenae’s famous king might be. He happened to be walking in his garden, a well-watered place, cutting soft myrtle shoots to place in his own hair. When he saw us, he called out, “Greetings, strangers. Who are you? Where are you from? What country is your home?” Orestes said, “We are from Thessaly, on our way to the Alpheus river, to offer sacrifice to Olympian Zeus.” After hearing that, Aegisthus answered, “You must be my guests, share this feast with us. It so happens I’m now offering an ox, sacrificing to the nymphs. If you get up at dawn tomorrow, you’ll be no worse off. So come, let’s go inside the house.” Saying this, he took our arms and led us off the road, insisting that we must not turn him down. Once we were inside the house, he said, “Let someone bring in water right away, so these guests can stand around the altar by the basin where they purify their hands.”

But Orestes said, “We’ve just cleansed ourselves in pure water from a flowing river.
If strangers must join with the citizens in making sacrifice, then, Aegisthus, we are ready and will not refuse, my lord.”

Those were the words they spoke in public.
The slaves guarding their master with their spears set them aside, and then all lent a hand to do the work, some bringing in the bowl to catch the blood, others fetching baskets, still others kindling fire and setting basins around the hearth. The whole house echoed.
Then your mother’s consort took barley grain and sprinkled it across the altar, saying “Nymphs of the rocks, may I and my wife, Tyndareus’s daughter, in our home offer frequent sacrifice, enjoying success, as we do now, and may my enemies always fail”—he meant Orestes and yourself.
My master prayed for quite the opposite, not saying the words aloud, so he might win his ancestral home. Then from a basket Aegisthus took a sacrificial knife, sliced off some of the calf’s hair and set it with his right hand on the sacred fire.
When servants raised the calf up on their shoulders, he slit its throat and spoke out to your brother, “People claim this about men from Thessaly—they’re among the best at butchering bulls as well as taming horses. So, stranger, take this knife and demonstrate to us if that report about Thessalians is true.”
Orestes gripped the well-made Dorian knife, tossed from his shoulders his fine-looking cloak, and chose Pylades to help him in the work.
Pushing slaves aside, he took the calf’s hoof, and, stretching out his arms, cut open the beast’s white flesh and then stripped off the hide faster than any runner could complete two circuits on a track for racing horses.
He opened up the flanks, and Aegisthus picked up the sacred entrails in his hands to examine them. But on the liver the lobe was missing. There were signs of damage which the man inspecting them could see close to the gall bladder and the entry vein. Aegisthus was upset. My master asked, “Why are you disturbed?” “Stranger,” he replied, “what I truly fear is foreign treachery. Most of all I hate Agamemnon’s son, an enemy of my house.” My master said, “Do you really fear an exile’s trickery, you, lord of the city? Let someone bring me a Phthian axe to replace this Doric knife so I can split apart the breast bone and we can feast upon the inner organs.” He took the axe and struck. Then Aegisthus picked up and separated out the innards and peered at them. As he was bending down, your brother, standing on tiptoe, hit him on the spine and sliced through his vertebrae. His whole body went into convulsions, shaking up and down, and he kept screaming. He was dying in his blood, a brutal death. The servants saw and rushed to get their spears for a fight of many men against just two. But Pylades and Orestes stood there, brandishing their weapons with great courage. Then my master cried, “I have not come here as an enemy, not to the city or my servants, but to avenge myself on the man who butchered my own father. I am unfortunate Orestes. You men, old servants of my father, do not kill me.” After the servants heard Orestes’ words, they pulled back their spears. Then an old man who’d been a long time in the household recognized him. At once they placed a wreath on your brother’s head, shouting and rejoicing, and he’s coming here carrying a head to show it to you—not the Gorgon’s head, but from the person you so hate, Aegisthus, the slaughtered man, who has just paid his bitter debt for murderous bloodshed.
[The Messenger leaves.]

CHORUS
O my friend, set your feet to dancing, leaping with joy up to heaven, like a deer.
Your brother has emerged triumphant,
and now he’s won himself a crown, in a contest surpassing those which happen by Alpheus’ streams.
Come, as I perform my dance, sing out a song of glorious victory.

ELECTRA
O light! O blazing chariot of the sun!
O earth and darkness I gazed at before!
I’ve freedom now to open up my eyes—
Aegisthus, who killed my father, is gone.
Come, my friends, let us bring out whatever I keep stored up in the house as adornments for my brother’s hair.
I’ll make a crown for his victorious head.

CHORUS
Bring on your decorations for his brow, and we’ll keep up the dance the Muses love.
Now those dear kings we had before will rule this land of ours with justice.
They’ve cast down those who broke our laws.
So let our joyous harmonies ring out!

[Orestes and Pylades enter with their attendants, who are carrying the body of Aegisthus.]

ELECTRA
O Orestes, you glorious conqueror, born from a father who was a conqueror in the war at Troy. Take these ribbons for your locks of hair. You’ve come back home, and your race around the stadium track has not been in vain. You’ve killed Aegisthus, the man who killed our father, yours and mine,
our enemy. And you, who stood by him, Pylades, reared by a pious father, receive this garland from my hand. For you were equal with Orestes in this fight.
I hope I see you always prospering.

ORESTES
First of all, Electra, you must believe the gods were leaders in what’s happened here.
Then praise me as a servant of the gods and circumstance. I have returned back home and killed Aegisthus, not in word but deed.
To underscore the truth of what I’ve said,
I’ve carried here the dead man’s corpse for you.
If it’s what you want, lay him out as prey for carrion beasts or impale him on a stake, a prize for birds, those children of the sky.
In earlier days he was called your master,
and now he is your slave.

ELECTRA
I feel ashamed,
but nonetheless I wish to speak.

ORESTES
What is it?
Speak up. There’s nothing you need to fear.

ELECTRA
I’m afraid to insult the dead—someone might heap reproaches on me.

ORESTES
But no one would blame you in the slightest.

ELECTRA
Still, the city is hard to please and loves to criticize.

ORESTES
Speak, sister, if you wish to say something.
We are his enemies—there are no rules in our relationship with him.

ELECTRA [to the corpse of Aegisthus]
Well, then,
how shall I first begin to speak about the evil you have done? Where do I end?
What words shall I use for the central part?
It’s true that in the dawn I never stopped rehearsing what I wished to say to you, right to your face, if I were ever free from my old fears. Well, now I am free.
So I will pay you back, abusing you
the way I wanted to when you were living.
You ruined me, taking away from me and from this man here our dear father, although we had not done you any wrong.
You made a shameful marriage with my mother,
then killed her husband, who was commander of all the Greeks. You never went to Troy.
And you were so idiotic you believed that with my mother you would get a wife who was not evil, though she was betraying my father’s bed. But you must know this—when any man corrupts another’s wife, having sex with her in secret, and then is compelled to take her as his wife, such a man is foolish if he believes that, though she was not virtuous before, she will be now with him. You were living a miserable life, although it seemed as if the way you lived was not so bad.
You knew well you’d made a profane marriage.
My mother realized she had in you a sacrilegious man. You are both evil, and so you both acquired each other’s traits.
She shares your wickedness, and you share hers.
You heard these words from all the Argives—
“That woman’s husband,” not “that man’s wife.”
And this is truly shameful—when the wife controls the home rather than the husband.
I hate those offspring whom the city calls children of their mother instead of saying sons of their father. Still, when any man makes a distinguished marriage well above his station, no one ever talks of him, but only of his wife. But most of all,
you were so ignorant you were deceived in claiming to be someone because your strength was in your wealth. But that's not worth a thing—its presence is short lived. What stays secure is not possessions but one's nature, which stands beside you and takes away your troubles.
But when riches live with fools unjustly,
they bloom a little while, then flee the house.
As for the women you had, I will not speak—
a virgin should not talk about such things.
I will simply hint at them in passing.
You were disgusting, with your royal home and your seductive looks. May I never have a husband with the face of a young girl, but one who has the look of a real man.
His children hold onto a life of war.
You pretty ones are only ornaments to decorate the dancing choruses.
So get out of here, and stay ignorant
how you were found in time and punished.
And let no man committing wicked acts believe that if he runs the first leg well, he is defeating justice, not before he moves across the finish line and ends
the last lap in his life.

CHORUS

What this man's done is dreadful, and he's paid a dreadful price to you and to Orestes. For Justice possesses an enormous power.

ELECTRA

Well, you servants must remove the body and hide it inside, somewhere in the dark, so that when my mother comes over here
she will not see his corpse before she's killed.

[Pythades and the attendants take Aegisthus's body into the house.]

ORESTES [looking off stage]

Wait a moment. Here is something else we need to deal with.
ELECTRA

What? Are those men I see reinforcements coming from Mycenae?

ORESTES
No. That’s the mother who gave birth to me.

ELECTRA
How convenient—right into our net. She looks so impressive in that carriage, such fine clothes.

ORESTES
What are we going to do? Kill our mother?

ELECTRA
You’re not overcome with pity now you’re seeing our mother in the flesh?

ORESTES
Ah, how can I murder her? She bore me. She raised me.

ELECTRA
Just as she killed our father, yours and mine.

ORESTES
O Phoebus Apollo, that prophecy of yours was foolish!

ELECTRA
Where Apollo is a fool, what men are wise?

ORESTES
You instructed me to kill my mother, but killing her is wrong.

ELECTRA
On the other hand, if you’re avenging your own father, how can you be harmed?
ORESTES
I’ll be prosecuted for slaughtering my mother. Before now I’ve been free of all impiety.

ELECTRA
But if you refuse to defend your father, you’re a guilty man.

ORESTES
But my mother? If I kill her, how will I be punished?

ELECTRA
What will happen to you if you give up avenging your own father?

ORESTES
Could it have been a demon in the likeness of a god who spoke to me?

ELECTRA
Sitting on the sacred tripod? I don’t think so.

ORESTES
I cannot believe this prophecy was good.

ELECTRA
You must be a man! Don’t give way to cowardice. Set for her the same trap you used to kill her husband, when you destroyed Aegisthus.

ORESTES
I’ll go in. I’m on the verge of a horrendous act, something truly dreadful. Well, so be it, if gods approve of this. And yet, for me the contest is not sweet at all, but bitter.

[Orestes goes into the house. Clytaemnestra arrives in a chariot with attendants.]
CHORUS
Greetings lady, child of Tyndareus, queen of this country of the Argives, 1200 sister of those noble twins, [990] Zeus’s sons, who live in heaven among the fiery constellations and have the honourable task of saving mortals from the roaring waves.1 Welcome! I worship you no less than I revere the gods for your great wealth and happiness.
My queen, welcome. Now is the time for us to attend to your good fortunes. 1210

CLYTAEMNESTRA
Get down from the carriage, women of Troy, and take my hand, so I, too, may step down out of this chariot. The houses of the gods may be adorned with Phrygian trophies, [1000]
but I obtained these female slaves from Troy, the finest in the land, as ornaments within my household, small compensation for the child I lost.2

ELECTRA
Mother, is it all right for me to take that blessed hand of yours, given I live in this decrepit house, 1220
just like a slave, now I have been cast out of my paternal home?

CLYTAEMNESTRA
The slaves are here.
Do not exert yourself on my behalf.

ELECTRA
Why not? After all, I’m a captive, too, and sent away from home. Like these women,

1This is another reference to Castor and Polydeuces (or Pollux). The twins occupied a position among the stars (we call them the Gemini), and hence were an aid to navigation. Here Euripides calls them both sons of Zeus, although Castor is usually considered a mortal child of Tyndareus.

2This is a reference to Clytemnestra’s daughter Iphigeneia, whom Agamemnon sacrificed at the start of the Trojan expedition in order to persuade the gods to change the winds.
I was taken when my house was seized and left without a father.

CLYTAEMNESTRA

Well, your father brought that about with plots against the ones he should have loved the most, his own family. I’ll describe it to you, though when a woman gets an evil name, her tongue grows bitter, and that’s regrettable, it seems to me. But you should learn the facts of what’s gone on and then despise it, if it’s worth your hate. If not, why hate at all? Now, Tyndareus gave me to your father, not intending that I or any children I might bear should die. But that man, when he left his home, convinced my daughter to accompany him, by promising a marriage with Achilles, and took her to the anchored fleet at Aulis.¹ There he had Iphigeneia stretched out and slit her pale white throat above the fire. If he’d killed one girl for the sake of many, to protect the city from being taken, or to help his house, or save his family, I’d have pardoned him. But he killed my child because of Helen’s lust, because the man who’d taken her as wife had no idea how to keep his treacherous mate controlled.² For all of that, although I had been wronged, I’d not have grown enraged or killed my husband. But he came back to me with some mad girl—possessed by gods—and put her in his bed, so he could have two brides in the same house.³ Women are foolish. I’ll concede the point. But given that, when a husband goes astray, rejecting his domestic bed, his wife

¹Aulis was the agreed meeting point for the great naval expedition to Troy. Agamemnon persuaded Clytaemnestra to let Iphigeneia come to Aulis by lying about a marriage to Achilles.

²Helen was married to Menelaus, Agamemnon’s brother. She was ran off with Paris, a prince of Troy, and went back to Troy with him, thus launching the Trojan War. Agamemnon was the commander of the army sent to get Helen back.

³The young girl was Cassandra, daughter of Priam, king of Troy, given as a war prize to Agamemnon.
may well wish to follow his example and find another man to love. And then the blame makes us notorious—the men who caused it all are never criticized.
If someone had carried Menelaus away from home in secret, should I then have killed Orestes to save Menelaus, my sister’s husband? How would your father have put up with that? So is it not right for him to die? He slaughtered my own child.
I would have kept on suffering at his hands.
I killed him. The road lay open to me, and so I turned towards his enemies.
After all, which one of your father’s friends would have joined me to commit the murder?
Speak up, if you wish, and answer frankly.
In what way was your father’s death unjust?

CHORUS
There’s justice in your words, but that justice is disgraceful. If she has any sense, a woman should give way in everything to her own husband. Those who disagree are not, in my view, worth considering.

ELECTRA
Bear in mind, mother, the last thing you said, offering me the chance to be frank with you.

CLYTAEMNESTRA
Yes, my child. And I won’t take that back.
I’ll repeat it now.

ELECTRA
You’ll hear me out, mother, and won’t punish me?

CLYTAEMNESTRA
No, I won’t do that,
not if I’m giving pleasure to your heart.

ELECTRA
Then I’ll speak, starting with an opening comment.
O mother, I do wish you had more sense.
Your beauty brings you praise that’s well deserved—the same is true for Helen—but you two were born twin sisters, both very silly, quite unworthy of your brother Castor.
She was willing to be carried off and ruined,
and you destroyed the finest man in Greece.
Since people do not know you as I do,
you used the excuse you killed your husband for your child. But before it was decided that your daughter would be sacrificed, no sooner had your husband left his home,
than you were fixing your fine locks of hair seated at your mirror, and any wife who prims her beauty when her husband’s gone, you can scratch her off the list as worthless.
There’s no call for her to show her pretty face outside the home, unless she’s seeking mischief.
Of all the women in Greece, I believe you were the only one who felt happy whenever Trojan fortunes were successful and whose eyes would frown whenever they got worse, because it was your hope that Agamemnon would not get back from Troy. But nonetheless, you could have stayed a truly virtuous woman.
The husband you had was in no way worse than that Aegisthus, and he’d been chosen by the Greeks themselves to lead the army.
When your sister Helen did what she did,
you had an opportunity to gain great glory for yourself, since bad conduct sets a standard for our noble actions and makes them something everyone can see.
But even if, as you now claim, our father killed your daughter, how have you been wronged by me and by my brother? Why is it, once you’d killed your husband, you did not give our father’s home to us, but filled your bed with someone else’s goods and for a price bought yourself a marriage? And why is it this husband has not been made an exile for banishing your son? Why is he not dead instead of me? The way I’m living now has killed me twice as often as my sister.
If justice says that murder pays for murder,
your son Orestes and I must kill you to avenge our father. If your act was just, then this one must be, too. Any man who marries a degenerate woman

in order to get wealth and noble birth is foolish. A virtuous, humble marriage is better for the home than something grand.

CHORUS

Marrying women is a matter of chance.

Some, I notice, work out well, others badly.¹

CLYTAEMNESTRA

My child, it was always in your nature to love your father. That’s how things turn out.

Some are their fathers’ children, while others

love their mothers much more than their fathers.

I forgive you. I don’t get much delight, my child, from what I’ve done. But why are you so dirty and dressed in such filthy clothes?

You’ve just been confined and given birth.²

Alas, my schemes have made me miserable!

I urged my anger on against my husband

more than I should have done.

ELECTRA

Well, it’s too late now to moan about it. There’s no remedy.

My father’s dead. But why don’t you bring back your wandering son, who is still an exile?

CLYTAEMNESTRA

I’m too afraid. I worry about myself, not him. And he is angry, so people say, about the murder of his father.

ELECTRA

Why let your husband be so cruel to me?

¹These lines of pithy moralizing at the end of Electra’s speech and in this speech by the Chorus sound out of place here. Some editors have removed them as a later addition to the text.

²Some editors find these two and half lines a very odd change of subject for Clytaemnestra, who is now dwelling on her own sorrow. Cropp moves them to the opening of Clytaemnestra’s speech at 1380 below, where they do seem more appropriate.

That’s how he is. You’ve a stubborn nature.

Because I’m suffering. But I’ll stop being angry.

Then he’ll no longer be so hard on you.

He’s got ideas of grandeur, living there inside my home.

You see? Once again you’re kindling a brand new quarrel.

I’ll be silent, my fear of him being what it is.

Stop this talk. Why have you asked me to come here, my child?

You’ve heard, I think, that I have given birth. Please offer up a sacrifice for me—I don’t know how to do that—on the tenth day, as is our custom with an infant child. I’ve had no children before this, and so I lack experience.

That task belongs to the woman who delivered the child.

I was by myself in labour—I gave birth to the child all on my own.

Is this house here so remote there are no friendly neighbours?
ELECTRA
No one wants poor people as their friends.

CLYTAEMNESTRA
Well, I'll go and make the gods a sacrifice for the full term of the child. When I'm done carrying out this favour for you, I'll leave, off to the field where my husband's making an offering to the nymphs. You servants, take this team away. Put them in the pens. When you think I've finished sacrificing to the gods, stand ready. I must satisfy my husband's wishes, too.

ELECTRA
Enter this poor home. For my sake take care the soot-stained walls don't stain your clothes. You can offer the gods the sacrifice that is now due.

And now the basket is ready, the knife is keen, the one which killed the bull you'll lie beside when you're struck down. In the home of Hades you'll be wife to the man you slept beside while you were alive. I am doing you this favour, and you are offering me full retribution for my father.

[Electra goes into the house.]

CHORUS
Evils are repaid. Winds of fortune for this house are veering round. Back then my leader, my very own, fell slaughtered in his bath. Roof and stone walls of the house resounded, echoing his cries—"You vicious woman, why kill me now I've come to my dear land after ten harvest seasons?"
The flow of justice has reversed itself and brings to judgment for adultery the killer of her unhappy husband once he finally returned back home, to the towering Cyclopean walls.
With her own hand she murdered him,
the sharpened edge of a keen axe gripped in her fists. Poor sad husband!
What evils overtook this wretched woman?
She did it like a mountain lion prowling through a woodland meadow.

CLYTAEMNESTRA [from inside the house]
By the gods, children, don’t kill your mother!

CHORUS
Do you hear that cry from inside the house?

CLYTAEMNESTRA [screaming from inside]
Aiii . . . my god . . . aiii . . . not me . . .

CHORUS
I moan, too, as her children strike her down.
The god indeed dispenses justice,
whenever it may come.
You’ve suffered horribly, sad lady, but you performed unholy acts against your husband.

[Orestes, Pylades, Electra, and Attendants emerge slowly from the house with the bodies of Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra.]

CHORUS
But here they come, moving from the house, stained with fresh-spilled blood from their own mother,
a trophy, proof of their harsh sacrifice.
There is no house, not now or in the past,
more pitiable than the race of Tantalus.

ORESTES
O Earth and Zeus, who sees all mortal men, look on these abominable bloody acts and these two corpses lying on the ground, struck down by my hand, repayment for everything I have had to suffer.

ELECTRA
Too much cause to weep, my brother, and I have made this happen.
In my desperation, my fiery rage burned on against my mother, the one who bore me, her daughter.

CHORUS
Alas for fortune, your sad destiny, a mother who has given birth to pain beyond enduring, bearing wretched misery and more from your own children, and yet it’s just—you’ve paid for murdering their father.

ORESTES
Alas, Phoebus, that justice you sang of had an obscure tone, but the pain you caused was clear enough—you’ve given me an exile’s fate, far from these Greek lands. To what other city can I go? What host, what man with reverence will look at me, who killed my mother?

ELECTRA
Alas, alas for me! Where do I go? To what wedding or what choral dance? What husband takes me to a bridal bed?

CHORUS
Your spirit is shifting back once more, changing with the breeze. Your thoughts are pious now, although profane before. You’ve done dreadful things, my friend, to your reluctant brother.

ORESTES
Did you see that desperate woman, how she threw her robe aside and bared her breasts for slaughter? Alas for me! The limbs which gave me birth collapsing and falling to the ground.
And her hair, I . . .

CHORUS
I understand.
You had to go through torments, hearing your mother's screams,
the one who bore you.

ORESTES
She stretched her hand toward my chin and cried, “My son, I beg you.”
She clung onto my face—
the sword fell from my hands.

CHORUS
Poor lady! How could you dare to watch your murdered mother breathe her last before your eyes.

ORESTES
I threw my cloak over my eyes,
then sacrificed her with the sword.
I shoved it in my mother's neck.

ELECTRA
I was encouraging you, as well—
my hand was on the sword.

CHORUS
You have inflicted suffering of the most dreadful kind.

ORESTES
Take this robe, hide our mother's limbs.
Close up her wounds. You gave birth to your own murderers.

ELECTRA [covering Clytaemnestra's corpse]
There, with this cloak I'm covering up one who was loved and yet not loved.

CHORUS
An end to the great troubles of this house.
[Castor and Polydeuces, the Dioscuri, appear above the building on the stage.]

CHORUS
But there above the roof beams of the house something’s coming. Spirits or gods from heaven?
That path does not belong to mortal men.
Why are they coming into human view?

CASTOR [from the top of the house]
Son of Agamemnon, you must listen.
The twin sons of Zeus are calling you, Castor and his brother Polydeuces, your mother’s brothers. We’ve just reached Argos, after calming down a roaring storm at sea,
a dreadful threat to ships, and witnessing the murder of our sister and your mother.
She’s had justice, but you’ve not acted justly.
As for Phoebus Apollo, I’ll say nothing.
He is my master. Although he’s wise, the oracle you heard from him was not.
You must accept these things and later on act on what Fate and Zeus have set for you.
Give Electra to Pylades as his wife to take back home. You must leave Argos.
It’s not right for you, who killed your mother, to set foot in the city. The Keres, those fearful dog-faced goddesses of death, will hound you everywhere, a wanderer in a mad fit. You must go to Athens and embrace Athena’s sacred image.¹
She’ll guard you from their dreadful writhing snakes and stop them touching you, by holding up her shield with the Gorgon’s face above your head.
There’s a place there—the hill of Ares—where gods first gathered to cast their votes on bloodshed, when savage Ares slaughtered Halirrothius, son of the god who rules the sea, enraged at the unholy raping of his daughter.²

²Ares, son of Zeus and god of war, killed Poseidon’s son, Halirrothius, over the attempted rape of Ares’s daughter, Alcippe. Ares was put on trial on Olympus and acquitted by the gods.
That hill is where decisions made by vote are most secure and sacred to the gods. Here you must stand on trial for murder. The process will result in equal votes, so you’ll be saved from death, for Apollo will take responsibility himself, since his shrine advised your mother’s murder. This law will be established from then on—those accused will always be acquitted if votes are equal. Struck by the pain of this, those fearful goddesses will then sink down into a chasm right beside the hill, a reverend and holy shrine for men. You must establish an Arcadian city by Alpheus’ streams, near the sacred shrine of Lycaean Apollo, and that city will bear your name. Those are my instructions. As for Aegisthus’ corpse, the citizens in Argos here will place it in a grave. But in your mother’s case, Menelaus, who has just reached Nauplia, a long time after overpowering the lands of Troy, will bury her, with Helen’s help. She’s come from Proteus’s home, leaving Egypt. She never went to Troy. It was Zeus’s wish to stir up war and bloodshed among men. So he sent Helen’s image off to Troy.¹ Since Pylades now has got a virgin wife, let him go home and leave Achaean land, with the man they call your brother-in-law to the land of Phocis. He must make him a very wealthy man.² But as for you, you must leave along the narrow Isthmus and go to the blessed hill of Cecrops.³

²The “man they call your brother-in-law” is the peasant who has been pretending to be a genuine husband to Electra.

³The Isthmus is the Isthmus of Corinth, a narrow strip of land joining the Peloponnese (where Argos is situated) with the main part of Greece. Cecrops is the mythical first king and founder of Athens. The Cecropian Hill is a reference to the Acropolis in Athens.
Once you're completed your appointed fate for doing the murder, you'll find happiness and be released from troubles.

CHORUS
O sons of Zeus, are we permitted to come near and speak to you?

CASTOR
That is allowed—you are not defiled by the murder committed here.

ELECTRA
And me, sons of Tyndareus, may I talk to you, as well?

CASTOR
You may. I blame Apollo for this murderous act.

CHORUS
How is that you two gods, brothers of this murdered woman, did not keep death's goddesses far from her home?

CASTOR
Destiny and Fate brought what must be—and Apollo's unwise utterance.

ELECTRA
What Apollo and what prophecies ordained that I must be my mother's murderer?

CASTOR
You worked together and shared a single fate. One ancestral curse has crushed you both.

ORESTES
After such a lengthy time I've seen you, my sister, and immediately must lose your love, abandoning you, as you abandon me.

CASTOR
She has a home and husband and will not suffer undue grief, except she leaves this Argive state.

ELECTRA
What else brings one more pain than moving out beyond the limits of one's native land?

ORESTES
But I'll go from my father's house, then undergo a trial by strangers for murdering my mother.

CASTOR
Be brave. You'll reach the sacred city of Athena. Just keep enduring all.

ELECTRA
Hold me, my dearest brother, your breast against my breast. The curses of a slaughtered mother divide us from our father's home.

ORESTES
Throw your arms around me. Give me a close embrace. Then mourn for me as if I'd died and you were at my burial mound.

CASTOR
Alas, alas! You've said things dreadful even for the gods to hear. I and those in heaven have pity for mortals who endure so much.

ORESTES
I'll not see you anymore.
ELECTRA
I’ll not come into your sight.

ORESTES
These are the final words
I’ll ever say to you.

ELECTRA
Farewell, my city! A long farewell to you my fellow countrywomen!

ORESTES
Are you going already,
my most faithful sister?

ELECTRA
Yes, I am leaving now my soft eyes wet with tears.

ORESTES
Farewell, Pylades. Be happy.
Go and get married to Electra.

CASTOR
The marriage will be their concern.
You leave for Athens to escape these hounds, with their dark skins and hands made up of snakes.
They’re on a dreadful hunt to chase you down and bring you harvests of horrific pain.
We two are off to the Sicilian sea.
We’ll hurry there to rescue ships in need.
As we pass through the flat expanse of air,
we bring no help to those who’ve been defiled.
We do protect the men whose way of life reveres what’s just and holy, releasing them from overbearing hardships. Let no one wish to act unjustly or get on board with men who break their oaths. It’s as a god that I address these words to mortal men.

[Castor and Polydeuces disappear. Orestes leaves the stage. Electra and Pylades move off in a different direction. The attendants go with them.]
CHORUS
Farewell. Any mortal who can indeed live well without being ground down by misfortune, that man will find his happiness.
