Ovid

Metamorphoses

Translated by Ian Johnston Vancouver Island University
Nanaimo, BC Canada
ian.johnston@viu.ca

This translation is based on the Hugo Magnus edition of the Latin text (1892). It was first published on the internet in 2011. A full recording of the translation was produced by Naxos Audiobooks in 2012.

This document is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution CC by 4.0 and thus, provided the source is acknowledged, it may be (a) downloaded and distributed, in whole or in part, without permission and without charge and (b) freely edited and adapted to suit the particular needs of the person using it (e.g., for dramatic production).

Table of Contents

Translator's Note .................................................. 2

Book 1 ................................................................... 4
Invocation; Creation; Four Ages, War of the Giants; the Flood; Deucalion and Pyrrha; Apollo and Pytho; Apollo and Daphne; Io, Argus, and Mercury; Pan and Syrinx; Phaëton.

Book 2 .................................................................. 37
Phaëton; Callisto and Jupiter; Callisto and Arcas; Coronis and Apollo; Ocyroë; Battus and Mercury; Aglauros, Mercury, and Juno; Europa and Jupiter.

Book 3 .................................................................. 74
Cadmus and the Dragon; Actaeon and Diana; Semele, Jupiter, and Juno; Juno, Jupiter, and Teiresias; Echo and Narcissus; Pentheus and Bacchus.

Book 4 .................................................................. 106
The Daughters of Minyas; Pyramus and Thisbe; Mars and Venus; the Sun, Leucothea, and Clytie; Salmacis and Hermaphroditus; Athamas and Ino; Cadmus and Harmonia; Perseus and Atlas; Perseus and Andromeda.

Book 5 .................................................................. 140
Perseus and Phineus; the Muses and Minerva; the Daughters of Pierus and the Muses; Typhoeus and the Gods; the Rape of Proserpine; Ceres and Cyrene; Arethusa and Alpheus; Triptolemus and Lycus.

Book 6 .................................................................. 170
Arachne and Minerva; Niobe; Leto and the Lycians; Marsyas; Tereus and Philomela; Orithyia and Boreas.
BOOK 7 ................................................................. 203
Jason and Medea; Medea and Aeson; Medea and Pelias; Medea and Aegeus; Aeacus and the Myrmidons; Cephalus and Procris.

BOOK 8 ................................................................. 241
Minos and Scylla; Daedalus and Icarus; Calydonian Boar Hunt; Althaea and Meleager; Permela and Achelous; Baucis and Philemon; Erysichthon and Maestra.

BOOK 9 ................................................................. 279
Hercules and Achelous; Nessus and Hercules; Galanthis, Dryope, Iolaus; Byblis and Caenus; Iphis and Ianthe.

BOOK 10 ................................................................. 315
Orpheus and Eurydice, Attis and Cybele, Cyparissus, Hyacinthus and Apollo, the Propoetides, Pygmalion; Myrrha and Cinyras; Atalanta and Hippomenes; Adonis.

BOOK 11 ................................................................. 347
Death of Orpheus; Midas and Bacchus; Midas, Pan and Apollo; Peleus and Thetis; Chione and Daedalion; Peleus and Psamathe; Ceyx and Halcyone; Aesacus and Hesperie.

BOOK 12 ................................................................. 380
Agamemnon at Aulis; Cynus and Achilles; Caeneus, the Centaurs and Lapiths; Periclymenus and Hercules; death of Achilles.

BOOK 13 ................................................................. 407
Ajax and Ulysses; Hecuba and Polymnestor; Memnon, Aeneas and Acis; Galatea and Polyphemus; Glaucus

BOOK 14 ................................................................. 449
Scylla and Circe; The Cercopes; The Cumaean Sibyl; Ulysses, Polyphemus and Circe; Picus and Circe; Diomedes in Italy; Aeneas in Latium; Vertumnus and Pomona; Iphis and Anaxarete; Romulus.

BOOK 15 ................................................................. 486 Mysceleus; Croton; Pythagoras; Egeria; Hippolytus; Tages; Cipus; Aesculapius; Julius Caesar; Augustus.

GLOSSARY AND INDEX ............................................ 522

TRANSLATOR’S NOTE

In this translation, the line numbers in square brackets refer to Ovid’s Latin text, the line numbers without brackets refer to the English text. In the latter, partial lines are counted together in the reckoning, so that two or three consecutive short lines are equivalent to one full line. The explanatory footnotes, the headings, and the summaries at the start of each book have been added by the translator.
Note that in this English text, the possessives of words ending in -s is usually indicated by a single apostrophe (e.g. Hermes, Hermes’). This procedure does not add a syllable to the word (both Hermes and Hermes’ have two syllables). Sometimes, however, for metrical reasons, the possessive is indicated by -’s (e.g., Bacchus, Bacchus’s). This form of the possessive adds a syllable to the word (the sound -iz): hence, Bacchus’ has two syllables; whereas, Bacchus’s has three.

A word on pronunciation of names: the letters –eus and –aus at the end of a name are normally two syllables in this translation: (e.g., Orpheus is pronounced Òr-phe-us, Pentheus is pronounced Pén-the-us, Menelaus is pronounced Me-ne-lá-us, and so on); a dieresis over a vowel indicates that it is pronounced by itself (e.g., Danaë is pronounced Dá-na-e, not Dá-nai, Nereids is pronounced Né-re-ïds, Caŷster is pronounced Ca-y-stér, and so on); final vowels are pronounced by themselves (as in Calliope, Penelope, Achaea, and so on), although there are several exceptions, usually when the name has long been adopted into English (e.g., Crete, Palatine, Rome, Ganymede, Nile).

Ovid’s text sometimes creates minor confusion with names either because he does not use a specific name (or uses it very sparingly) or because he identifies someone with a phrase which is not always immediately clear to the modern reader (e.g., “girl from Arcady,” “descendant of Abas,” “Cyllenean god,” and so on). I have in many cases inserted the more familiar name (e.g., Perseus, Mercury, Callisto), sometimes in addition to the original phrase, sometimes in place of it.

Another source of minor confusion is Ovid’s habit of changing verb tenses frequently from present to past and back again, often in mid-sentence. While this stylistic habit is not uncommon in conversational English, it is rare in formal English. Different translators handle this feature in different ways. Some put all verbs into the past tense, while others follow Ovid’s changes faithfully. Most recent translations (so far as I can tell) retain the movement back and forth between present and past tenses, but do so less frequently than Ovid does, so that there is more consistency within short passages of the English. This last-mentioned practice is the one I have followed in this translation.

Finally, Ovid’s speeches are sometimes difficult to keep track of, because he will have a speaker telling us what someone else said, and that account may include more direct speech also containing direct speech. At one point he has speeches within a speech within a speech. To avoid complex, awkward, and confusing punctuation, I have tried to stick to a simple use of quotation marks (double quotation marks for direct speech, and single quotation marks for all speeches within speeches) and have indented the left margin appropriately to indicate how direct or indirect a particular speech is.

I would like to acknowledge the great help I have received from other translations and commentaries, above all those by Mary M. Innes, A. S. Kline, Henry T. Riley, and A. D. Melville.
BOOK I

[Invocation; Primal Chaos; formation of Earth; regions of Earth; distribution of winds; creation of life; Prometheus makes human beings; the Golden Age; the Silver Age; the Bronze and Iron Ages; war of the Giants; Jupiter’s anger at the human race; the story of Lycaon; the Deluge; Deucalion and Pyrrha restore the human race; the creation of other life; Apollo kills Pytho; Apollo and Daphne; Daphne is transformed; Inachus and Io; Jupiter has sex with Io, changes her into a cow, and gives her to Juno; Juno sets Argus to guard Io; Io reveals herself to Inachus; the story of Syrinx; Mercury kills Argus; Juno ends Io’s torments; the story of Phaëton begins.]

My spirit drives me now to sing about the forms of things changed into new bodies. Since you gods caused these transformations, too, inspire what I am going to write about, and bring forth an uninterrupted song, from the primal origins of the world down to this present age.

Before the sea, PRIMAL CHAOS

land, and heavens, which cover everything, the entire world of nature looked the same. They called it Chaos, a crude, confused mass, nothing but lifeless stuff and scattered seeds of matter not yet properly combined, all piled up in the same place together. There was no Titan yet providing light to the world, Phoebe did not grow larger and renew her crescent horns, nor did Earth remain hanging in the surrounding air, balanced by her own weight.1 Amphitrite had not yet pushed her arms through long margins of the coastal shores, and where there was land there was also sea and air, but the ground was not solid, the water was not fit for swimming, and the air lacked any light.2 No matter retained its own proper shape—one thing would keep obstructing something else, 1In Greek mythology, the Titans were the immediate divine descendants of the first two gods Gaia and Ouranos. Phoebe (from the Greek for shining) was one of the original Titans and became synonymous with the moon, while the Titan who provided light from the sun was Hyperion or Hyperion’s son, Helios. Ovid usually identifies the sun god as Apollo.

2Amphitrite, wife of Neptune, god of the sea, here stands for the sea generally.
for in one body cold things fought with hot,
with dry, soft with hard, and heavy things with those which had no weight.

This conflict
god and more favourable nature stopped.
For he cut land off from sky, and water from land, and separated the bright heavens from heavy air. Then, once he had drawn off these elements and taken them away from the confused mass, he set them apart, fixing them in place in harmonious peace.
The fiery might of vaulted, weightless sky pushed out, creating for itself a place in the loftiest heights. Closest to it in lightness and location was the air.
The Earth, denser than these two, attracted the larger elements and was pressed down by its own weight. Water flowing round it took possession of the furthest regions and enclosed the solid sphere completely.

After the god—whichever god it was—had divided Chaos and arranged it in this way, forcefully dividing it in sections, first of all he shaped the land in the form of a large sphere, to make sure it was the same on every side, and then he commanded seas to be spread around and swell with blustery winds, encircling shorelands of the places they surrounded.
He added springs, huge pools, and lakes, and set sloping banks to contain descending streams.
These differ in different locations—
some the earth itself absorbs, while others reach the sea and, entering the expanse of open water, beat against the coasts instead of riverbanks. He also ordered plains to be extended, valleys to sink, leaves to cover trees, and stony mountains to rise up. And just as heavens are split, with two zones in the north, two in the south,
and a fifth zone hotter than each of these,
so the god was careful to distinguish the enclosed matter with the same number and on earth marked out as many climates. Of these, the one in the centre is too hot to live in, and two are covered in deep snow. Between these areas he placed two more, assigning them a temperate climate, mixing heat and cold. Over these hangs air, heavier than fire, to the same extent that earth is heavier than water.\footnote{The heavens were divided up by astronomers with five parallel circles: the equinox (in the centre), the two tropics (Cancer and Capricorn), and two polar circles. These verses indicate that the god marked out the climates on the earth’s surface in a similar numerical pattern: the hot zone is between the tropics, the temperate zones are between the tropics and the polar circles, and the frigid zones are beyond the polar circles. The Latin uses the terms right and left; following many others, I have substituted north and south.}

There he also ordered clouds to gather and vapours, too, and thunder which so stirs the minds of human beings, as well as winds producing lightning bolts and flashes. The maker of the world did not permit these winds to take possession of the air indiscriminately. It is, even now, difficult to stop them ripping the world to pieces, though each of them directs his blasts at different places, so great is the strife among the brothers.\footnote{The winds were the sons of Astraues and Aurora and thus brothers. The idea here is that the creator of the world controlled the ferocity of the winds by having them blow in different directions (or from different places) rather than all together in the same direction.} Eurus moved away towards Aurora, to Nabath’s kingdom, to Persia and the heights lying underneath the rays of morning sunlight.\footnote{Eurus was the east wind (i.e., blowing from the east). It comes from Aurora (meaning dawn). Nabath was a name associated with regions in the Middle East, especially Arabia.} Zephyrus is closest to the evening star and shores warmed by the setting sun. Cold Boreas invaded Scythia and northern lands.\footnote{Scythia refers generally to northern territories.} And rain-filled Auster with his constant clouds soaks regions lying on the facing side.\footnote{Zephyrus was the west wind, Boreas the north wind, and Auster the south wind.} Over these he placed bright, weightless aether, without a trace of earth’s impurities.
BOOK ONE

Scarcely had he separated all things within specific limits in this way, when the stars, which had remained long hidden, buried in thick mist, began to blaze forth through the entire sky. And to make sure no place would lack its forms of living things, the stars and forms of gods inhabited the floor of heaven. Then waters yielded to let glittering fish live there, the land took in wild beasts, the gusting air took birds. What was still missing was an animal more spiritual than these, more capable of higher thinking, which would be able to dominate the others. Man was born—either that creator of things, the source of a better world, made him from divine seed, or the Earth, newly formed and divided only recently from lofty aether still held seeds related to the heavens, which Prometheus, Iapetus’ son, mixed with river water and made an image of the gods who rule all things. Other creatures keep their heads bent and gaze upon the ground, but he gave man a face which could look up and ordered him to gaze into the sky and, standing erect, raise his countenance towards the stars. Thus, what had been crude earth and formless was transformed and then took on the shapes of human life, unknown till then.

First the Golden Age was born. It fostered faith and right all on its own, without laws and without revenge. Fear and punishment did not exist. There were no threatening words etched in brass and set up for men to read, nor was a crowd of suppliants afraid of the looks of men who judged them. They lived in safety, with no one there to punish. No chopped-down pine tree had yet descended down its mountain slope into the flowing waves, so it might travel to a foreign world, and mortals were familiar with no shores except their own. There were no deep ditches enclosing towns, no straight trumpets of war or horns of curving brass, no swords or helmets. People passed the time in gentle leisure and security, with no need for troops. The earth itself, also free and untouched by hoes, not yet carved up by any ploughs, produced all things spontaneously, and men, content with food which grew without duress, gathered arbutus fruits, mountain berries, cornels, berries clinging to harsh brambles, and fallen acorns from the spreading tree of Jupiter. It was always springtime, and gentle breezes of warm air caressed flowers which did not grow from any seeds. Soon unploughed earth brought forth her crops, as well, and the land, without being refreshed, grew white with heavy ears of grain. Rivers of milk would sometimes flow. Sometimes streams of nectar and yellow honey dripped from green oak trees.

---

1Iapetus and his son Prometheus were Titans, members of the family of ruling gods before Jupiter overthrew his father, Saturn, and imprisoned him. Jupiter and the major gods around him are called Olympians, because they are associated with Mount Olympus in northern Greece.

2The Romans inscribed their laws on brass and placed the tablets in a public place for people to see.

Once Saturn was cast in gloomy Tartarus, Jupiter ruled the world. A Silver Age then followed, less favourable than gold, but still more valuable than yellow bronze. Jupiter shortened the previous springtime and split each year in different seasons, with winter, summer, changeable autumn, and short-lived spring. Then, for the first time, air glowed white, scorched with blazing arid heat, and ice hung down, congealed by wind. Then men first moved to dwellings. Their homes were caverns, dense thickets, and brushwood bound with bark. Then they began to bury Ceres’ seeds.

---

1 The reference here is to chopping trees down on mountain slopes in order to construct ships from timber.
2 The tree of Jupiter is the oak.
3 The first family of gods, led by Saturn, was overthrown by Jupiter, and most of them were confined deep underground. Tartarus was the lowest point of the underworld.
in lengthy furrows, and young bullocks groaned, straining at the yoke.¹

After these two ages, a bronze race followed, with fiercer natures, more inclined to wage horrific war, but not to act without due piety. Finally came the brutal Age of Iron. During this era of debased desires, every form of crime broke out, and honour, truth, and faith ran off. In their place appeared cheating, treachery, deceit, viciousness, and criminal cravings for possessions. Men set sails to catch the winds, though sailors at this point did not understand them well, and ships’ keels, which for a long time had stood high in the hills, scudded through unknown seas. Careful surveyors marked long boundaries on lands as common to men earlier as air and sunlight. And the fertile soil no longer was required to provide just crops and food it was obliged to give, for men went to the bowels of the earth and dug for ores, which spurred them on to vice. These the Earth had hidden and moved away to Stygian shades.² Now harmful iron emerged and gold, which brings more injuries than iron. Then war, which fights with both, comes on the scene, brandishing and rattling weapons in hands all stained with blood. Plunder becomes a way of life. Guests are not safe from those who welcome them, nor is the father from his son-in-law. Love of brothers is also rare. Men hope their wives will die, and wives all feel the same about their husbands. Dreadful stepmothers mix lethal poisons, and sons keep asking about their father’s age before his time. Piety lies conquered, and virgin Astraea, ¹Ceres was the goddess responsible for food and grain crops.

²The Stygian shades were associated with the river Styx, one of the main rivers of the Underworld. Thus, iron and gold are deep in the earth, close to Hades.
the last celestial being, abandoned Earth
now soaked in blood.¹

And to make the lofty aether
no more safe than Earth, they say that Giants tried to overrun the realms of heaven,
by piling one mountain on another,
up to the soaring stars. Then Jupiter, the all-powerful father of the gods,
hurled down his lightning bolt, smashed Olympus, and split Ossa away from Pelion lying underneath.² When those frightful Giants lay buried in the structure they had made, men claim that Earth, drenched with great quantities of her children’s blood, grew damp, then gave life to the warm gore, and changed it to the form of human beings, so that some monuments of that ferocious race might still remain.
But those progeny, scorning gods above,
were violent—eager, before all else,
to keep on killing. You could well conceive that they were born from blood.

When Saturn’s son,
father of the gods, sees what is going on
from his loftiest citadel, he groans, and, recalling the polluted banquet at Lycaon’s table, as yet unknown, because it is so recent, in his mind senses an enormous rage, a feeling befitting Jupiter.³ He calls a meeting.
Those summoned are not tempted to delay.

There is high in the heavens a pathway conspicuous for its very whiteness and visible when skies are clear. This track men call the Milky Way. For gods above the road leads to the halls and royal home of the great Thunderer. To left and right

¹Astraea, daughter of Jupiter, was goddess of justice.
²Olympus, Ossa, and Pelion are all mountains in northern Greece. The Giants, children of Earth, piled them on top of each other in order to attack heaven.
³The story of Lycaon is told below, lines 1.283 ff.
stand crowded throngs beside the open gates of homes belonging to the nobler gods.¹ Common gods inhabit various places, but here the powerful and famous ones who live in heaven make their dwelling place. If I might be allowed a bold expression, this is a place I should not hesitate to call great heaven’s imperial palace.² And so, when the gods above are seated in the marble inner room, Jupiter, sitting high above them all and leaning on his ivory sceptre, shakes his head three or four times, tossing that fearful hair which sets the earth, sea, and stars in motion, then opens his mouth, and speaks these words, stating his indigation:

“My worries about the earthly realm were no greater when each of those serpent-footed Giants was ready to throw his one hundred arms around the captured sky, for even though the enemy was savage, still that war hung on one group and had a single cause. Now I must wipe out the race of mortals over the entire world, in all places where Nereus roars.³ I swear I’ll do it, by all the infernal rivers flowing through Stygian groves underneath the earth!⁴ We have already tried all other options, but a wound beyond all cure must be removed, sliced off with a knife, so that healthy parts are not corrupted, too. My subjects include demi-gods, rustic deities, nymphs, fauns, satyrs, and wood-dwelling spirits

¹The great Thunderer is, of course, Jupiter himself. The nobler gods correspond, more or less, to the twelve Olympian gods of Greek mythology. They are Jupiter, Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercury, Neptune, Vulcan, and Apollo. Pluto, brother of Jupiter and Neptune, lives in the Underworld.
²The expression might be considered “bold” because it involves an implicit comparison of Jupiter and Augustus Caesar.
³Nereus was an ancient sea god. Here the name stands for the sea generally.
⁴The gods commonly swore their most solemn oaths on the river Styx, a major river of the Underworld. Such oaths cannot be broken.
in the mountains. These we do not yet think worthy of a place in heaven—but still, we may surely let them live on in those lands we have assigned to them. Do you believe, you gods above, that they will be quite safe, when Lycaon, famous for his cruelty, sets traps for me, the god who governs you and has the lightning bolt at his command?"

All the gods respond. With great passion they demand punishment for the person who has dared such things. It was like the time an impious gang were burning to snuff out the Roman name with the blood of Caesar. The sudden terror of so great a fall stunned the human race, and the entire globe shook with horror.¹ The people's loyalty was no less pleasing to you, Augustus, than those gods' feelings were to Jupiter. When he has spoken out and raised his hand to check the noise, all the gods stop talking. Once stifled by that royal authority, the murmuring dies down, and Jupiter breaks the silence once again by saying:

“...You need not worry. That man Lycaon has been punished. But I will inform you what he did and tell you his penalty. Reports of that bad time had reached our ears. I hoped that they were false, so I slipped down from the top of Mount Olympus and moved across the earth, a god in human form. It would take too long to describe in full how much evil I discovered everywhere. The report itself was less disturbing than the truth. I had passed by Maenalus, a dreadful place where wild beasts have their lairs, Lycaeus with its ice-cold groves of pine, and Mount Cyllene.² From there, just as late twilight is dragging in the night, ¹It is not clear whether these lines are a reference to the murder of Julius Caesar or to a conspiracy against Emperor Augustus.

²Maenalus, Lycaeus, and Cyllene are mountains in Arcadia, in the Peloponnese.
I reach the realm of the Arcadian king and his inhospitable home. I signal a god has just arrived, and common folk have started praying. At first, Lycaon ridicules their pious vows. Then he says:

‘Using an obvious test, I will confirm whether this man is mortal or a god,
and there will be no doubt about the truth.’

He is prepared to kill me in the night without warning, when I am fast asleep.
He finds that way of testing for the truth amusing. And not satisfied with that, he takes a sword and slices open the throat
of a hostage sent from the Molossians, makes some of the half-dead limbs more tender in boiling water, and roasts the rest of him above an open fire.¹ When he sets this flesh on dining tables, with avenging fire
I bring the roof down on his household gods, who are worthy of their master. He runs off quite terrified, and then, once he reaches the quiet countryside, begins to howl, trying without success to speak. His mouth gathers up the fury he holds inside, and his bloodlust for habitual slaughter turns him against herd beasts, so even now he delights in blood. His clothes have disappeared, changed to hair, his arms to legs. He is now a wolf and still retains some vestiges of his old form—the same grey colouring, the same violence in his expression,
the same glare in his eyes, the same savagery in his appearance.

Thus, one house collapsed,
but more than one deserves to be destroyed.
Wherever Earth lies open, the Furies exercise their sway.² You might well believe

¹The Molossians lived in north-west Greece, near Epirus.
²The Furies were goddess of blood revenge, particularly within the family. If they are everywhere on earth, then people must be very wicked.
that men had sworn to act as criminals.
Let them all quickly pay the penalty they richly merit! So stands my judgment.”

Some of the gods speak up, endorsing what Jupiter has said, spurring him on and encouraging his rage, while others play their parts with silent affirmation.
But still, for all of them the destruction of the human race is something grievous.
They ask about the future of the world.
How will Earth look if she lacks human life?
Who will now place incense on the altars?
Is Jupiter prepared to let all things be preyed upon by savage animals?
The king of the gods commands them not to ask such questions and, to relieve their worries, tells them he will take care of everything.
He promises a race of beings unlike the previous ones and says their origin will be a wonder.

And now Jupiter
is about to scatter his lightning bolts on every country, but he is afraid the sacred aether, by some accident, may be set on fire from so many flames
and distant polar regions may burn up.
Then, too, he remembers that Fate decrees
there will come a time when the sea and land,
as well as all the palaces of heaven,
will be attacked by flames and set alight,
and Earth’s mass, produced with so much effort, will be in danger.¹ So he sets aside those weapons forged by hands of Cyclopes and approves a different punishment—he will send rains down from the entire sky and wipe out mortal men beneath the waves.² So he immediately locks up North Wind in Aeolus’ caves, along with any blasts

¹An ancient Roman prophecy predicted the world would end in fire.
²The Cyclopes (singular Cyclops) were huge, one-eyed monsters. They worked for Vulcan, god of the forge, making lightning bolts for Jupiter.
which scatter clouds collecting overhead, and sends out South Wind, flying on sodden wings, his dreadful face veiled in pitch-black darkness, his beard heavy with rain, water flowing from his hoary locks, mists sitting on his forehead, his flowing robes and feathers dripping dew.\(^1\)

When Jupiter stretches his hand and strikes the hanging clouds, heavy, crashing rainstorms start pouring down from heaven. Iris, Juno’s messenger, dressed in various colours, gathers the water up and brings it back to keeps clouds well supplied.\(^2\) Crops are flattened, fond hopes of grieving farmers overthrown, their long year’s work now wasted and in vain. And Jupiter’s rage does not confine itself to his own sky. For his brother Neptune, god of the azure sea, provides him help with flooding which augments the pouring rain.

He summons the rivers to a meeting and, after they have entered their king’s home, says to them:

“\textbf{This is not now the moment for a long speech from me. What we require is for you to discharge all your power. Open your homes, remove all barriers, and let your currents have free rein to flow.}”\(^\text{[280]}\)

Neptune gave his orders, and the rivers return, relax the mouths of all their springs, and race down unobstructed to the sea. Neptune himself with his trident strikes the land. Earth trembles and with the tremor lays bare the sources of her water. Streams spread out and charge through open plains, sweeping away—all at once—groves, planted fields, cattle herds, men, and homes, along with sacred buildings and their holy things. If any house remains still standing and is able to resist such a huge catastrophe, nonetheless, waves higher than the house cover the roof,

\(^1\)Aeolus was the god in charge of all the winds.

\(^2\)Iris, as well as being a messenger for the major deities, was also the goddess of the rainbow.
and its towers, under pressure, collapse beneath the surge. And now the land and sea are not distinct—all things have turned into a boundless sea which has no ocean shore. Some men sit on hilltops, others in boats, pulling oars here and there, above the fields which they just ploughed not long before. One man now sails above his crops or over roofs of sunken villas, another catches fish from high up in an elm. Sometimes, by chance, an anchor bites into green meadowland, or a curved keel scrapes against a vineyard submerged beneath the sea. And in those places where slender she-goats have grazed on grasses, misshapen sea calves let their bodies rest. Nereids are astonished at the groves, cities, and homes lying beneath the waves.\(^1\) Dolphins have taken over in the woods, racing through lofty branches and bumping into swaying oaks. Wolves swim among sheep. Waves carry tawny lions and tigers. The forceful, mighty power of the boar is no help at all, nor are the swift legs of the stag, once they are swept into the sea. The wandering bird, after a long search for some place to land, its wings exhausted, falls down in the sea. The unchecked movement of the oceans has overwhelmed the hills, and waters beat against the mountain tops. The deluge carries off most living things. Those whom it spares, because food is so scarce, are overcome by gradual starvation.

The fertile territory of Phocis, while still land, separates Aonia from Oeta, but when that flood took place was still part of the sea, a wide expanse of water which had suddenly appeared. In that place there is a soaring mountain which has two peaks striving to reach the stars.\(^2\) Its summit rises high above the clouds.

---

\(^1\)Nereids, daughters of Nereus and Doris, were nymphs of the sea.

\(^2\)Aeonia is part of Boeotia. The mountain in question is Parnassus, near Delphi.
Deucalion lands here in his small boat, with the wife who shares his bed, for the sea now covers every other place. They revere Corycian nymphs and mountain deities and prophetic Themis, too, the goddess who at that time controlled the oracle. No man was finer than Deucalion, no man loved justice more, and no woman had more reverence for gods than Pyrrha.

When Jupiter observes the earth submerged in flowing water, with only one man left from many thousands not so long before and sees one woman from so many thousands a short while earlier, both innocent, both worshippers of the gods, he scatters the clouds, and once North Wind has blown away the rain, he makes land open to the sky and heaven to the earth. And the sea’s rage does not persist. The lord of the ocean sets down his three-pronged weapon, calms the seas, and summons dark-blue Triton standing there above the ocean depths, his shoulders covered by native shells, and orders him to blow his echoing horn and with that signal summon back the flooding waters and the sea. Triton raised his hollow shell, whose spirals grow as they curl up from the base—that horn, when filled with air in the middle of the waves, makes coastlines under east and western suns echo its voice—and thus, once the god’s lips, dew dripping from his soaking beard, touched it, and, by blowing, sounded out the order to retreat, all the waters heard the call, on land and in the sea. They listened to it, and all of them pulled back. And so the sea had a shore once more, full-flowing rivers remained within their banks, floods subsided, hills appeared, land rose up, and dry places

---

1The Corycian Nymphs were naiads (nymphs living in fresh water lakes and rivers) inhabiting the springs on Mount Parnassus. The goddess Themis was, according to Greek legends, in charge of the oracles at Delphi before Apollo.

2Triton, a minor sea deity, was the son of Neptune and Amphitrite (although there are other lesser sea gods called by that name). His famous horn was made from a conch shell.
grew in size as the waters ebbed away. After a long time, exposed tops of trees revealed themselves, their foliage covered in layers of mud. The world had been restored. When Deucalion sees that earth is empty and observes the solemn silence over devastated lands, with tears in his eyes he speaks to Pyrrha:

"O wife and sister, the only woman alive, linked to me by common race and family origin, then by marriage, and by these dangers now, we two are the total population of the entire world, every place spied out by the setting and rising sun. The sea has taken all the others. Even now, there is nothing secure about our lives, nothing to give us sufficient confidence. Those heavy clouds still terrify my mind. O you for whom I have so much compassion, how would you feel now, if you had been saved from death without me? How could you endure the fear all by yourself? Who would console your grief? For if the sea had taken you, dear wife, I would follow you, believe me, and the sea would have me, too. How I wish I could use my father’s skill to replace those people and infuse a living soul in moulded forms of earth. The human race lives now in the two of us. Gods above thought this appropriate, and we remain the sole examples left of human beings."

Deucalion said this, and they wept. They thought it best to pray to the celestial god and to seek help from sacred oracles. Without delay they set off together to the stream of Cephisus, whose waters were not yet clear but by now were flowing

---

1Deucalion, son of Prometheus, and Pyrrha, daughter of Epimetheus, are first cousins (the children of brothers) as well as husband and wife.
within their customary river banks. And there, once they have sprinkled their heads and garments with libations, they approach the temples of the sacred goddess, whose pediments are stained with filthy moss and whose altars stand without a fire. As they touch the steps before the shrine, they both fall on the ground, and kiss the cold stone, in fear and trembling. Then they speak these words:

“O Themis, if gods may be overcome with righteous prayers and change their minds and if their anger may be averted, reveal to us the art by which destruction of the human race may be repaired and, most gentle goddess, assist our drowned condition.”

The goddess is moved and through the oracle speaks out:

“Leave the temple. Cover your head, and loosen the garments gathered around you. Then throw behind your backs the bones of your great parent.”

For a long time they are both astonished. Pyrrha’s voice is the first to break the silence, refusing to act on what the goddess said. Her mouth trembling, Pyrrha asks the goddess to grant her pardon, for she is afraid to offend her mother’s shade by throwing her bones away. Meanwhile, they both review the obscure dark riddle in the language of the oracle they have been given, examining the words between themselves. And then the son of Prometheus consoles Epimetheus’s daughter with these words to reassure her:

“Either we have here some subtle falsehood, or, since oracles respect the gods and do not recommend

---

1 Cephisus was a river which rose on Mount Parnassus and flowed near Delphi.
impious acts, our great mother is the Earth and, I assume, what people call her bones are those rocks in the body of the earth. These stones are what we have been commanded to throw behind our backs.”

Although the way Deucalion has interpreted the words encourages the Titan’s daughter, their hopes are plagued by fears—that’s how much both of them have doubts about the heavenly command. But then what harm will there be in trying? They go down, cover their heads, unfasten their tunics, and, as they have been ordered, throw stones behind where they are standing. The stones—and who would ever think this true, if old traditions did not confirm it?—began to lose rigidity and hardness. Gradually they softened, and then, once soft, they took on a new shape. They grew larger and before long acquired a gentler nature. One could make out a certain human form, but indistinctly, like the beginnings of marble carvings not yet completed, crude statues. But still, those pieces of them which were earthy and damp from any moisture were changed into essential body parts. What was solid and inflexible changed to bones, and what just a few moments before had been veins remained, keeping the same name. Soon, with the help of gods above, the stones which the man’s hand had thrown took on the form of men, and the stones the woman had cast changed into women. That’s why human beings are a tough race—we know about hard work and provide the proof of those origins from which we first arose.

The Earth brought forth the other animals spontaneously in various forms. After the moisture which had been there earlier had grown warm from the sun’s fire and wet swamps and marshes had swelled up from the heat, the fertile seeds of matter, nourished in quickening soil, as in their mother’s womb, increased in size and, over time, took on a certain shape. When the Nile with its seven river mouths leaves the sodden fields and sends its waters down their old channels and the brand new mud grows hot from the aetherial sun, farmers, as they turn the soil, find many animals. Of these creatures, some are just beginning, at the moment of being born. Men see some which are incomplete and lacking limbs. Often in the same body one section is alive, while another is crude earth. And so it’s true that when heat and moisture reach a certain temperature, they give birth, and from these two things all beings spring up. Fire may be the enemy of water, and yet moist heat produces everything—this discordant concord is appropriate for conceiving living things. And therefore, when Earth, still muddy from the recent flood, grew warm again from penetrating heat of the aetherial sun, she then brought forth countless forms of life, in part restoring ancient species and in part creating new monstrosities.

Though it was something Earth did not desire to do, at that time she also created you, great Pytho, serpent no one had ever known before. You took up so much space on mountain lands, you terrified those creatures newly made. The archer god, who before this had not used his lethal weapons, except to bring down fallow deer and fleeing goats, killed the snake, by shooting a thousand arrows into it, until his quiver was almost empty and poison poured out from the snake’s black wounds.¹ And to guarantee that the passing years could not erase the fame of that great deed, he set up sacred games, celebrated for their competition, called the Pythia, after the snake which he had overcome. In these games any young man who prevailed in boxing, running, or in chariot racing received the honour of an oak leaf crown.\(^1\) There was no laurel yet, and so Phoebus adorned his graceful temples and long hair with leaves from any tree.\(^2\)

¹The Archer God is Apollo, son of Jupiter and Latona.
BOOK ONE

Apollo’s first love was Daphne, the daughter of Peneus.\(^3\) It was not blind chance which made him love her, but Cupid’s savage rage. The Delian god, proud of his recent conquest of the snake, saw Cupid flexing his bow, pulling back the string, and said to him:\(^4\)

> “Impudent boy,
why play with weapons which are made for men?
Carrying that bow suits shoulders like my own, since I can shoot wild beasts and never miss and wound my enemy. I am the one who with my countless arrows has just killed that swollen Pytho, whose venomous gut covered such vast tracts of ground. Stay content kindling any kind of love you fancy with that torch of yours, but do not pre-empt those praises due to me.”

The son of Venus then replied to him:\(^5\)

> “O Phoebus, your bow
may strike all things, but mine can strike at you.
Just as all animals are less than gods,

---

\(^1\)The Pythian Games were one of four Panhellenic athletic competitions. They were held every four years at Apollo’s shrine in Delphi.

\(^2\)Phoebus is another name for Apollo. He is usually associated with a laurel wreath for reasons which emerge in the next section of the poem.

\(^3\)Peneus was a river god.

\(^4\)Apollo is sometimes called the Delian god because he and his twin sister, Diana, were born on the island of Delos.

\(^5\)Cupid was the son of Venus, goddess of love, and Mars, god of war.
so, to the very same extent, your fame is less than mine.”

Cupid spoke. Keen to act, he struck the air with beating wings and stood on the shady peak of Mount Parnassus. He pulled out two arrows from his quiver, each with a different force. One of them makes love run off, the other brings it on. The arrow which arouses love is gold, with a sharp, glittering head, while the arrow which inhibits love is blunt and has lead below the shaft. With this second arrow the god hit the daughter of Peneus, but with the first he struck Apollo’s bones, piercing right through them, into the marrow. He is immediately in love, but she runs away from the very name of love, delighting in deep places in the woods and skins of the wild beasts she chases down, emulating virgin Phoebe.¹ A ribbon holds her tousled hair in place. Many men court her, but she dislikes all suitors. And so, rejecting men, knowing nothing of them, she roams the pathless forest glades, without a care for Hymen, love, or marriage.² Her father often said:

“Daughter, you owe me a son-in-law.”

And often he complained:

“Daughter, you owe me grandchildren.”

But Daphne, despising the bridal torch as something criminal, with a modest blush, would wrap her loving arms around her father’s neck and say:

¹Phoebe is a name often given to Diana, the hunter goddess.
²Hymen was one of the deities of marriage.
“My dearest father, allow me to enjoy virginity forever. Diana’s father did that earlier.”

Her father does, in fact, grant her request, but your beauty, Daphne, is an obstacle to what you so desire. The way you look makes sure your prayers will not be answered. For Phoebus glimpses Daphne and falls in love. He wants to marry her, and what he seeks he hopes to get. But his own oracles deceive him. Just as light straw catches fire once grain is harvested, and hedges blaze from torches which some traveller by chance has brought too near or else left there at dawn, that’s how Phoebus is changed then into flames. That’s how his whole chest burns, and by hoping, he feeds a love that is in vain. He sees the tangled hair hanging around her neck and says:

“What would that hair of hers look like, if only it were beautifully arranged.”

He observes her eyes, like bright fiery stars, gazes at her lips—but the sight of them is not enough—and praises fingers, hands, her arms, and shoulders (more than half exposed!), imagining those parts which lie concealed are even lovelier. She runs away, swifter than a soft breeze, and does not stop when he calls her, crying these words:

“O nymph, daughter of Peneus, stay! I beg you. I do not chase you as an enemy. Nymph, stop! This is the way a lamb runs off, fleeing a wolf, or a deer a lion, or a dove on quivering wings takes flight to escape an eagle—each one of them racing from its enemy. But the reason I run after you is love. Alas for me!

1Diana was the virgin goddess of the hunt. Her father was Jupiter.
I feel so wretched—you might fall headfirst, or brambles scratch your legs (which don’t deserve the slightest injury)—and I might be the one who brings you pain. You rush ahead through rugged places. Set a slower pace, I beg you, and restrain your flight. I, too, will follow you more slowly. At least ask who it is that finds you so delightful. I am no shepherd or mountain dweller, or some uncouth local custodian of herds or flocks. You have no idea, you thoughtless girl, you do not know the man you’re running from. That’s why you scamper off. The Delphic lands, Claros, and Tenedos, the palace of Pataraea—all serve me. Jupiter is my father, and through me what has been and what is and what will be are each made known. Through me songs and strings resound in harmony. True, my arrows always find their mark, but there’s an arrow, with truer aim than mine, which has transfixed my uncommitted heart. The healing arts are my invention, and throughout the world I am called the Helper. The power of herbs is under my control. But my love now, alas, cannot be cured by herbs, and arts which aid all people are no help at all to their own master.”

The daughter of Peneus with timid steps ran off, away from him, as he was on the point of saying more. Though his speech was not yet over, she left, and he was by himself. And even then she seemed so beautiful. The winds revealed her body, as the opposing breezes blowing against her clothing made it flutter, and light gusts teased her freely flowing hair. She looked even lovelier as she fled. The youthful god can endure no longer wasting his flattery. Love drives him on.

1 Claros refers to a city in Asia Minor or to an island. Tenedos was an island near Troy, and Pataraea a city in Lycia, in Asia Minor.
With increasing speed, he chases after her. Just as a greyhound, once it spies a hare in an open field, dashes for its prey, and the hare, feet racing, runs for cover—one looking now as if he is about to clutch her and already full of hope he has her in his grip, his outstretched face brushing against her heels, while she, not sure whether she has been caught, evades his jaws, and runs away, his mouth still touching her, that’s how the god and virgin race off then, he driven on by hope and she by fear. But the one who follows, who has the help of Cupid’s wings, is faster. He gives her no rest and hangs above her fleeing back, panting on the hair across her shoulders. She grows pale as her strength fails, exhausted by the strain of running away so fast. Gazing at the waters of Peneus, she cries out:

“Father, help me! If you streams have heavenly power, change me! Destroy my beauty which has brought too much delight!”

Scarcely has she made this plea, when she feels a heavy numbness move across her limbs, her soft breasts are enclosed by slender bark, her hair is changed to leaves, her arms to branches, her feet, so swift a moment before, stick fast in sluggish roots, a covering of foliage spreads across her face. All that remains of her is her shining beauty.

Phoebus loved her in this form, as well. He set his right hand on her trunk, and felt her heart still trembling under the new bark and with his own arms hugged the branches, as if they were her limbs. He kissed the wood, but it shrank from his kiss. The god spoke:

1Along with many other translators I omit line 547 in the Latin (“which is the reason why I suffer harm”).
“Since you cannot be my wife, you shall surely be my tree. O laurel,
I shall forever have you in my hair, on my lyre and quiver. You will be there with Roman chieftains when joyful voices sing out their triumphs and long processions march up within sight of the Capitol.¹
And you, as the most faithful guardian of Augustus’ gates, will be on his door, and protect the oak leaves in the centre.²
And just as my untrimmed hair keeps my head forever young, so you must always wear eternal honours in your leaves.”³

Paean finished.³
The laurel branches, newly made, nodded
in agreement, and the top appeared to move, as if it were a head.

In Haemonia
there is a grove enclosed on every side by steep and hilly woods. Men call it Tempe.
Through here Peneus pours his roiling stream from the foot of Pindus.⁴ His heavy fall gathers up mists and drives them on, like fumes, drenching the tops of trees with spray. Places both near and far grow weary of his roar.
This is the house and home, the inner heart, of the great river. Seated in a cave carved out in the rocks, he sets down laws for the flowing rivers and nymphs who live within those streams. There the native waters of that country first assemble, unsure whether to congratulate or console Daphne’s father—the restless Enipeus, poplar-growing Spercheus, Aeas, old Apidanus, gentle Amphrysus,

¹The Capitol was one of the seven hills of classical Rome, an important site in the city.
²On the gates of Augustus Caesar’s home there was a crown of oak leaves, with laurel branches on either side.
³Paean was a name commonly given to Apollo as a healer of sickness.
⁴Haemonia was an old name for Thessaly, a region of northern Greece. Tempe was a valley through which the Peneus flowed. Pindus was a mountain in the area.
and not long afterwards other rivers taking exhausted waters to the sea, weary from meandering here and there, wherever their stream’s force has carried them.¹ Only Inachus is absent. Hidden deep inside a cave, he is increasing the volume of his water with his tears,
in total sorrow, grieving for Io, his missing daughter. He has no idea if she is enjoying life or sitting among the shades. Since he is unable to locate her anywhere, he believes she must be nowhere and so in his heart fears for the worst. Jupiter had glimpsed her returning from her father, the river, and had said:

“Virgin, worthy of Jupiter and about to make some man or other happy in your bed, while it is so hot,
with the sun in the middle of his path,
at his highest point, move into the shade of the deep woods.”

Jupiter pointed to some shadowy groves.

“If you are afraid
to go all by yourself into places where wild beasts lurk, you can safely enter the deepest parts of any grove at all with a god to guard you—no common god, but me who holds the heavenly sceptre
in my powerful fist and who flings down wandering thunderbolts. Do not fly from me!”

She was already fleeing and by now had gone past Lerna’s pastures and the trees planted in Lyrcaean fields.² Then Jupiter, spread darkness and concealed earth far and wide.

¹The names indicate rivers in Thessaly.
²Lerna was a swampy area in Argolis. Lyrcaea was a region in the Peloponnese near Arcadia.
He caught her as she was running away and forced her to have sex against her will.

Meanwhile Juno looks down on middle Argos, curious why swift clouds in bright daylight have brought on what appears like night. She knows they have not come from rivers, nor been sent from the moist earth, and looks around to see where Jupiter might be, knowing already her husband’s tricks, for he has been caught out so often. Not finding him in heaven, she says:

“Either I am quite mistaken, or I am being wronged.”

She glides down from the lofty aether, stands on the earth, and commands the clouds to go away. Jupiter has foreseen his wife’s arrival and has changed the daughter of Inachus so she resembles a sleek heifer. Even so, transformed into a cow, she is lovely. Juno, Saturn’s daughter, reluctantly approves of the fine-looking cow and asks who it belongs to, what herd it comes from, as if she is quite ignorant of the truth. Jupiter lies. In order to forestall any questions about parents, he claims the cow was born from earth. Juno then asks to have it as a gift. What can he do? To hand over his own love is cruel, not to hand her over is suspicious. Shame insists he should surrender Io, but then his love insists he should refuse. Love would have conquered shame, except for this—if he refused the partner of his bed and his own sister such a trifling gift, the cow might seem to be no cow at all.¹ He gave the girl to Juno.

¹Jupiter and Juno were husband and wife and brother and sister, both children of Saturn.
The goddess did not set aside all her fears at once. She was not sure she trusted Jupiter and worried about his devious tricks, until she handed Io on to Argus, son of Arestor, to keep watch on her. Around his head Argus had a hundred eyes, and these would take a rest two at a time, while the others stayed awake and remained on guard. No matter where he placed himself, he could see Io. When he turned his back, Io was still there, right before his eyes.

He lets her graze by day. Once the sun sets below the earth, he puts her in a pen and ties a rope around her innocent neck. She eats arbutus leaves and bitter herbs. In her sad state, she lies upon the ground, often on bare earth where there is no grass, instead of in her bed, and takes a drink from muddy streams. Then, too, when she wishes to hold those arms of hers in supplication out to Argus, she has no arms to stretch, and when she tries to utter a complaint, her mouth just makes a lowing sound. The noise makes her alarmed and scared of her own voice. She goes to riverbanks where in the past she often used to play by Inachus. But when she sees her new horns in the stream, she draws back from herself, amazed and fearful. The naiads have no idea who she might be, and even Inachus himself is unaware. But she walks behind her father and trails her sisters, allowing them to touch her, and approaching them for their approval. Old Inachus pulls herbs and holds them out. She licks his hands, kisses her father’s palm, and does not hold back her tears. If only words would come out with them, she would declare her name, describe her troubles, and ask for help. Instead of words, her hoof draws in the dust letters which convey the wretched story of how her body changed. Old Inachus, her father, hanging on the horns and neck of the snow-white heifer, groans and cries out:
“I feel so sad”

And then he groans again:

“I feel so wretched! Are you the daughter
I have been searching for in every land?
When you were missing, there was less sorrow than there is now, after we have found you.
You cannot speak or answer what I say,
but only give out sighs from your deep chest.
The only way you can converse with me is with lowing sounds. In my ignorance, I was getting marriage and a bridal bed prepared for you. My first hope was to have a son-in-law and then some grandchildren.
But now you will have to have a husband
from the herd, and then offspring from the herd.
And this great grief of mine I cannot end by dying. It is painful being a god.
Since the gate of death is closed, our sorrows are dragged out into everlasting time.”

While Inachus is grieving for his daughter, bright-eyed Argus takes Io from her father and leads her away to different pastures.
He himself sits on a high mountain peak,
some distance off, where from his position
he can keep close watch in all directions.

The ruler of the gods cannot endure that the granddaughter of Phoroneus suffer such misery a moment longer.\(^1\)
He calls his son whom the bright Pleiad bore and orders him to put Argus to death.\(^2\) Mercury does not delay for long. He ties wings on his feet, his strong hand grips that rod which brings on sleep, and he covers his head.\(^3\)
This done, the son of Jupiter leaps down

---

\(^1\)Phoroneus was the father of Inachus.
\(^2\)The Pleiad who gave birth to Mercury was Maia, one of the seven daughters of Atlas. They became the Pleiades when they were placed among the stars.
\(^3\)Mercury carried a rod or staff which could rouse people from sleep or put them to sleep or summon shades of the dead.
from his father’s citadel to the earth. There he takes off his cap and wings. The rod is the only thing he keeps, and with it, looking like a shepherd, he drives she goats, which he has stolen as he walks along, through trackless countrysides, playing a song on reeds he tied together. Juno’s guard, enchanted with the sound of this new art, speaks out:

“Whoever you are, you can sit with me here on this rock. There’s nowhere else where there is better grazing for your flock. As you see, this shade well suits a shepherd.”

The grandson of Atlas sat down and spent the passing day in conversation, talking of many things and playing melodies on reeds he stuck together, attempting to overpower Argus’ watchful eyes.

But Argus fights to keep soft sleep at bay, and though some of his eyes doze off, others stay awake. He asks how the shepherd’s pipe, something invented only recently, has been developed. Mercury replies:

“On the icy mountains of Arcadia among the hamadryads of Nonacris the most celebrated was a naiad—nymphs called her Syrinx.\(^1\) She had eluded many times the satyrs who pursued her, as well as those gods who inhabited the shady woods and fertile countrysides. She worshipped the Ortygian goddess in her actions and remained a virgin.\(^2\) She tied up her dress just like Diana and could have been confused with Leto’s child, except her bow was made of cornel wood, while Diana’s was of gold. Even so, her appearance was deceptive. Once Pan,

\(^1\)Hamadryads were tree nymphs. Nonacris was a mountain in the Peloponnese.
\(^2\)The Ortygian goddess was Diana. The word is a reference to the island Delos.
with a wreath of pine around his head, spied her on her way back from Mount Lycaeus and spoke to her.\footnote{Pan was the god of shepherds and a common presence in mountain forests.}

Now Mercury had to give more details—how the nymph then ran away, despising his pleas, through pathless regions, until she came to the gentle waters of the sandy Ladon stream and how here, with water hindering her way, she begged her sisters of the stream to change her shape, how Pan, just when he thought he had Syrinx in his arms at last, was holding marsh reeds instead of the nymph’s body, and then how, as he sighed there, wind passing through the reeds had made a subtle, plaintive sound, and Pan, captivated by the new art’s sweet voice, had said:

“This way of conversing with you will remain with me.”

And by using wax to join together reeds of different lengths, he had immortalized the young girl’s name.\footnote{The Cyllenean god is Mercury, who was associated with Mount Cyllene in Arcadia.}

The Cyllenean god, about to speak of these events, sees all of Argus’ eyes have closed, their bright lights overcome by sleep.\footnote{He lowers his voice at once and touches the drowsy eyes with his magical rod, forcing them to doze more soundly. And then, with his hooked sword he quickly hacks away the nodding head from where it joins the neck, throws it, covered in gore, down from the rock, and stains steep cliffs with blood.}

“Lie there, Argus. The light you had in all those eyes of yours has been extinguished, and a single night now sits inside your hundred orbs.”
Then Juno, Saturn’s daughter, picked up those eyes, set them in her own bird’s feathers, and filled its tail with starry gems. Immediately enraged, she made no attempt to hide her anger. To the eyes and mind of that Argive girl she sent out a terrifying Fury, pierced her breast with hidden stings, and drove her through the whole world in wandering terror.

And you, O Nile, remained the final stage of Io’s measureless pain. She reached you, fell onto her knees at the river’s edge, threw her neck back, lifted her face high up towards the stars—that was the only thing that she could do—and by her groans and tears and sad lowing seemed to be complaining to Jupiter and praying for an end to her distress. Jupiter throws his arms around Juno’s neck and asks her to end her punishment. He says:

“Set your fears aside.
In future she will never cause you grief.”

And he commands the Stygian waters to witness what he says. Once the goddess has calmed down, Io regains those features she possessed before and becomes the nymph she was in earlier days. The stiff hair leaves her body, the two horns shrink away, her eyes contract, the bones inside her jaw decrease in size, her arms and hands come back, and her hooves vanish, changing to five nails. So Io now looks nothing like the cow, except for her still beautiful appearance. Happy to have the use of her two feet, the nymph stands up, but is afraid to speak, in case her voice should utter lowing noises, just like a heifer. Timidly she tries once more to use the words she has stopped using. Now she is a very famous goddess, worshipped by large multitudes of people dressed in linen. In time, Io bore a son, Epaphus, who came, so it is believed, from the seed of almighty Jupiter. With Io he now guards our civic shrines.

---

*Junos bird is the peacock.*

Phaëton, child of the sun, was the same age as Epaphus and equalled him in spirit. At some point, Phaëton boasted aloud that Phoebus was his father. He was proud and would not back down, something Epaphus, grandson of Inachus, could not endure. So he said:

“You are mad if you believe everything your mother tells you and then puff yourself up with the fancy image of a fictitious father.”

Phaëton blushed—shame checked his anger—and took the rebuke of Epaphus to Clymene, his mother, saying to her:

“To grieve you even more, mother, I was silent, though I am free and bold. These insults make me feel ashamed. I hear them said without being able to speak against them. If I originate from a family of gods, show me some sign of a lofty birth and then confirm for me I come from heaven.”

He spoke and then wrapped his arms around his mother’s neck and begged, by his own head and the head of Merops, her husband, and by the wedding torches of his sisters, that she would offer him some proof of his true parent. Clymene was moved—but one could never say for certain whether that came from Phaëton’s pleading or from her resentment of the charges made against her. She stretched out both her arms, looked up to the sun’s light, and cried:
“My son,
I now swear to you by this radiant light,
marked by brilliant rays, which hears and sees us,
that you are the child of this very sun which you are looking at. You are from him, the controller of the world. If my words are false, let Sun himself remove from me my power of seeing him. Let that light be the last to reach my eyes. And for you, it is not difficult to learn about your father’s home. The house where he rises lies in land beside our own. If your mind has any inclination, then go there, and put your questions to the god himself.”

After his mother says this, Phaëton, overjoyed, at once runs off, seizing hold of heaven in his mind. He travels past his own Ethiopians and India, located under fiery stars, eagerly hurrying to where his father rises.¹

¹Merops, husband of Clymene, Phaëton’s mother, was king of the Ethiopians, traditionally close to the land where the sun rises.
BOOK II

[The palace of the Sun; Phaëton asks to drive his father’s chariot; Apollo reluctantly agrees; Apollo instructs Phaëton how to drive the chariot; Phaëton sets out but loses control; the Earth catches fire; springs and rivers dry up; the Earth appeals to Jupiter; Jupiter destroys Phaëton; Phaëton’s family laments; the daughters of the Sun are turned into trees; Cycnus is transformed into a swan; the Sun reacts to Phaëton’s death; Jupiter seduces Callisto; Diana rejects Callisto; Juno punishes Callisto by turning her into a bear; Arcas meets his mother Callisto as a bear; Jupiter sets Arcas and Callisto in the constellations; Juno visits Tethys and Oceanus; the Raven and the Crow; the daughters of Cecrops; Minerva punishes the Crow; how the daughter of Coroneus became a crow; the Raven tells Apollo about Coronis; Apollo kills Coronis but rescues his child from the womb and gives him to Chiron; Apollo punishes the Raven; Ocyrhoe is turned into a horse; Mercury turns Battus to stone; Mercury and Herse; Minerva visits Envy; Envy poisons Aglauros; Mercury turns Aglauros to stone; Jupiter and Europa; Jupiter abducts Europa]

The palace of the Sun, high in the sky, has soaring pillars, bright with gleaming gold and fiery bronze, the highest pinnacles are of white ivory, and double doors give off a silver light. Their artistry is even finer than the materials, for on them Mulciber has carved the seas encircling lands lying in the centre, the globe of Earth, and heaven suspended above that globe.¹ The waves hold sea-green gods—echoing Triton, shifty Proteus, Aegaeon with arms pressing the huge backs of whales, along with Doris and her daughters (some seem to be swimming, others sitting on the shore, drying their green hair, and some being carried on a fish—in appearance all look different and yet somehow the same, as sisters ought to).² The Earth has cities, human beings, woods, wild beasts, rivers, nymphs, and other rural deities. Above these is placed the image of a brilliant sky, ¹Mulciber is another name for Vulcan, the divine artisan.

²Triton, as we have seen in Book I, had a conch shell whose noise resounded around the world. Proteus was a sea god who could change his shape at will. Aegaeon was a sea monster with a hundred arms, and Doris a sea nymph, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys and wife of Nereus.
six constellations on the right-hand doors and the same number on the left-hand side.¹

After Phaëton, Clymene’s son, came up the steep path and went inside the home of the father he was not sure about, he instantly set out to make his way into his father’s presence, but then stopped some distance off. He could not continue moving any closer to that brilliant light. Wrapped in purple robes, Phoebus was sitting on a throne sparkling with bright emeralds.² To his right and left stood Day, Month, and Year, Ages and Hours, spaced equally apart, with the new Spring encircled by a crown of flowers. And naked Summer stood there, carrying garlands of wheat, Autumn, too, stained with trodden grapes, and icy Winter with untidy snow-white hair. Then the Sun, placed in the middle of them all, with eyes which perceive all things, noticed the young man trembling at the strangeness of the palace and said:

“What has led you to travel here? What are you seeking in my citadel, Phaëton, child no parent should disown?”

Phaëton said:

“O universal light of the enormous world, Phoebus, father—if I use that name with your permission and if Clymene is not concealing some crime under a deceitful picture—give me a token, father, so that men will believe I am a true child of yours. Erase the doubts in my own mind.”

¹The constellations are the signs of zodiac.
²Ovid here and elsewhere calls the sun god Phoebus, from the Greek word for “shining.” The name is most commonly associated with Apollo, whose identification as the god of the sun is not normally found in earlier Greek mythology, where the god involved with the sun is usually a Titan, not one of the Olympians. Elsewhere in the poem Ovid sometimes makes the god of the sun a Titan (the son of Hyperion).
He spoke.
His father set aside the beams gleaming all around his head and told Phaëton to come closer. Then he embraced the lad
and said:

“You are a worthy son of mine—that cannot be denied—and Clymene has stated your true origin. Now ask for any gift you like which will relieve the doubts you feel, so I may offer it and you receive it. Let Stygian pools, which my eyes have not yet seen and which gods swear by, be present here as witnesses to what I promise.”

He had scarcely finished,
when Phaëton asked for his father’s chariot,
the right to guide his wing-footed horses for one day. Phoebus regretted the oath he had just sworn. He shook his splendid head two or three times and said:

“Those words of yours have made my words too reckless. I wish I could take back what I have promised! I confess this is the one thing, son, I would refuse.
Still, I can try to talk you out of it.
What you want is not safe, Phaëton. You’ve made a huge request for a gift not suited to your strength or youth. Your fate is mortal, but what you wish is not for mortal men.
In your ignorance, you are aspiring for more than what is lawful to be done, even with gods above. Each deity is allowed to follow his own pleasure, but no one, except myself, is able to stand upon the fire-bearing axle.
Even the one who governs vast Olympus, whose terrible right hand hurls thunderbolts, does not drive this chariot. And what is there more powerful than Jupiter? The track

\[^1\]When gods swear a promise by the river Styx, the promise cannot be withdrawn.
is steep at the beginning—fresh horses
in the morning can hardly make the climb.
The highest part is in the middle of the sky,
where looking down upon the sea and land is often frightening, even for me,
and giddy terror makes my heart tremble.
The final section of the path slopes down.
It requires a steady hand. Moreover,
Tethys herself, whose waters down below receive me, has a constant fear I'll fall too quickly.' Then, too, the sky rushes past in a never-ending whirl, dragging stars high up, spinning them in rapid circles.
I drive in the opposite direction,
but its force, which overpowers all things,
does not overpower me, as I move against its rapid orbit. But suppose you get the chariot. How would you manage?
Will you be able to make way against the whirling heavens, so their swift motion does not carry you away? Perhaps your mind imagines there are groves up there, cities, homes, and temples richly endowed with gifts.
The road passes through dangers and visions of wild beasts. Even if you keep on course and are not drawn astray, still you must move through the opposing horns of that bull Taurus, the bow of Haemonian Sagittarius, the maw of the fierce Lion, on one side
the savage claws of Scorpio bending in a sweeping arc and, on the other, the curved claws of the Crab.² And those horses—
you will not find them easy to control, those spirited beasts, whose mouths and nostrils snort out the fires blazing in their chests.
They have trouble following my commands when their fierce hearts are hot. Their necks fight back against the reins. My son, you must take care I don't become the giver of a gift which kills you. While conditions still permit,

¹Tethys was a goddess of the sea and a Titan, daughter of the original gods Ouranos and Gaia.
²Haemonian also means Thessalian. This is a reference to the centaur (half horse, half human being) Chiron, who, according to a number of writers, was placed in the zodiac as Sagittarius.
change what you want. Of course, you still desire sure evidence which will help you to believe you are born of my own blood. But I provide firm proof by fearing for you, and I show I am your father by a father's worries. Look at my face! I wish you could insert those eyes of yours into my heart and sense my fatherly anxiety in there! Finally, look around at whatever the rich world contains and ask for something great and good out of heaven, earth, and sea. There are so many! I will not refuse. This is the only thing I'm asking you not to take, and, in truth, it should be called a punishment rather than an honour. Phaëton, you're asking for a penalty and not a gift. Why, in your ignorance, my boy, do you put arms around my neck to win me over? Do not have any doubt—I shall give whatever you have chosen, for I swore by the waters of the Styx. But you must make a wiser choice."

Phoebus ends his words of warning, but Phaëton rejects his father's words and, all aflame with desire to guide the chariot, holds out for what he's asked for. And so his father, having delayed as long as possible, leads the young man to the soaring chariot, a gift from Vulcan. The axle is gold, as is the pole and the curved outer rims running around the wheels. The rows of spokes are made of silver, while along the yoke chrysolites and gems set in a pattern cast their dazzling light back onto Phoebus. While bold Phaëton is admiring these, gazing at the artistry, lo and behold, watchful Aurora from the shining east opens up the purple doors to the hall crammed full of roses. The stars all vanish, their cohorts driven off by Lucifer, the last to leave his station in the sky.¹ When the Titan sees him go, as the earth and world are growing redder and the horns
on the crescent moon appear to vanish, he orders the swift Hours to yoke the horses.²
Those quick goddesses respond to his commands.
They lead the horses out from lofty stalls—
the beasts, filled with ambrosial nourishment, are snorting fire!—and then attach to them the jingling harnesses. Next, the father rubs divine ointment on his young son’s face, making it invulnerable to searing flames.
He sets his rays in his son’s hair, heaving sighs from an anxious heart prophesying disaster, and says:

“My boy, if you can
at least listen to your father’s warnings, spare the whip, and hold the reins more strongly.
These horses charge ahead all on their own.
What’s hard is holding them with their consent.
And do not be tempted by the pathway directly through the five celestial zones.
There is a track carved out at an angle
in a wide curve contained inside three zones.
[130]
Avoid the Arctic and the southern poles, and the Bear linked to the north.³ Make your trip along this route. You will see certain tracks left by my wheels. And so heaven and earth get equal heat, do not guide the chariot too low or drive it through the upper sky.
If you go too high, you’ll burn up heaven’s roof, and if too low, the earth. The safest course to take is through the middle. Do not let the right wheel make you turn aside towards the twisted Snake or the left one lead you

¹Lucifer was the morning star, which appeared just before the dawn.
²Ovid here calls Phoebus a Titan. The Greek sun god was usually a Titan (Helios or Hyperion), but Apollo is an Olympian god, not a Titan.
³For a description of the earth’s five zones, see 1.63 ff. This advice appears to be warning Phaeton not to take a direct route across the five zones and crossing the poles, but to follow the sun’s usual path. The Bear (now often called the Plough or the Big Dipper) is a constellation close to the North Star.
to the low down Altar.
Maintain your course between the two. All that remains I leave to Fortune, who I pray will help you out and take better care of you than you do. While I tell you all this, damp Night has touched the boundaries placed on the western shore. We do not have the freedom to delay. We have been summoned! Bright Aurora shines, and the darkness has been driven away. Your hands must seize the reins, or if your mind has changed, take my advice, not my chariot, while you still can, while you still have your feet on solid ground, and while you are not yet acting on your unfortunate desires and, with no experience, standing there inside the chariot. Let me provide the earth with daylight, while you look on in safety."

Phaëton, with his young body, takes his place in the light chariot and waits there, happy to have the reins now resting in his hands. He thanks his reluctant father. Meanwhile, the swift horses of the sun—Pyroeis, Eoüs, Aethon, and the fourth one, Phlegon—keep whinnying. They fill the air with flames and strike the barriers with their hooves. Tethys, who does not know her grandson’s destiny, throws back the gates and offers those horses the freedom of the boundless universe. They race off on their journey, hooves speeding through the air, slicing the opposing clouds. Lifted on wings, they outstrip the eastern wind rising from the same regions of the sky. But for the horses of the Sun the weight is much too light, for they no longer pull their customary load. Just as curved ships without a proper ballast toss around, for their lack of weight makes them unstable, as they move through the sea, so that chariot, without its usual freight, leaps through the air and is tossed up high, like something empty.

---

1The Snake and the Altar are constellations. The former is high in the northern sky, the latter very low in the southern sky. Since the Sun’s path is from east to west, the north will be to the right of the chariot.
As soon as the four-horse team observes this, they charge ahead, leaving the beaten track, not running the same path they used before. Phaëton, alarmed, unsure how to use the reins entrusted to him, does not know where the path might be, and even if he did, he would still lack the strength to guide his team. Then, for the first time, the cold Triones were warmed by the sun’s rays and tried in vain to dip down in the forbidden ocean.¹

The Serpent, closest to the frozen pole, who earlier was sluggish with the cold and not a threat to anyone, warmed up and grew more frightening from the heat.² They say you, too, Boötes ran away confused, though you were slow and held up by the Plough.³

But when unfortunate Phaëton looked from high in the aether down on the earth lying far, far underneath him, he turned pale. His knees shook with sudden fear, and his eyes, in such a powerful light, were obscured by darkness. And now he would have preferred never to have touched his father’s horses. Now he is sorry he confirmed his birth and managed to get what he requested. Now he desires to be called Merops’ son, as he is carried like a ship driven by North Wind’s blasts, whose captain has let go the useless rudder and turned things over to praying and the gods. What can he do?

A large part of the sky lies behind him, but even more is there before his eyes. In his mind he surveys them both, sometimes glancing ahead towards the west, which Fate will ensure he does not reach, and sometimes looking back towards the east. Stupefied, not knowing what to do, he is unable to let go the reins or keep gripping them. He does not even know the horses’ names. He trembles to see astonishing things and images of huge wild beasts scattered in various places throughout the sky. There is a place where Scorpio curves his claws in two arcs and, with his tail and pincers bending on either side, stretches his limbs across the space of twin constellations. When the boy sees this beast, moistened with sweat from pitch black poison, threatening to attack with his curved sting, cold terror numbs his mind, and he lets go the reins. Once they drop down and touch the horses’ backs along the top, the team then swerves off course and runs ahead without restraint, through regions of the air unknown to them. Wherever their instincts drive them, they race forward, with no control, and charge at stars fixed high in lofty space, hurling the chariot through trackless places. At times, they head for the highest regions, and then at times are carried headlong down, on a path much closer to the earth. Moon is astounded that her brother’s horses are racing on below her own. Scorched clouds begin to smoke. In all the highest places, the land goes up in flames, then splits apart into yawning cracks, and with its moisture drawn away, dries up. All the grass turns white, trees and leaves catch fire, and parched harvest crops supply the fuel for their own destruction.

¹The Triones, meaning ploughing oxen, are the Great Bear and the Little Bear constellations. The stars look something like a wagon with oxen attached. These stars, at the latitude of the Mediterranean, do not disappear below the horizon (i.e., are forbidden to dip into the sea). For the story of these constellations see the section on Callisto below (2.584 ff.).

²The Serpent (also called Draco and Anguis) is a constellation in the northern sky.

³Boötes (from the Greek word for ox driver) is a northern constellation.

But these complaints are insignificant. Great cities perish, walls and all. The flames turn whole countries and their populations into ash. Woods and mountains are consumed. Athos burns, as do Cilician Taurus, Tmolus, Oeta, Ida (once famous for its springs but now dried out), Helicon (home of the Muses), Haemus (not yet linked to Oeagrus). Aetna is on fire, too, a tremendous blaze with redoubled flames, along with twin-peaked Parnassus, Eryx, Cynthus, Othrys, Rhodope (now at last about to lose its snow), Mimas, Dindyma, Mycale, and Cithaeron (which was made for sacred rituals). Even Scythia gets no protection from its icy cold. Caucasus is on fire, as are Ossa, Pindus, Olympus (greater than either one), towering Alps, and cloud-capped Apennines.1 Then Phaëton sees all parts of the world ablaze and cannot bear the intense heat. His mouth inhales the scorching air, as if from some deep furnace. He feels his chariot get hot. He can no longer tolerate the ash and sparks thrown up. On every side he is surrounded by hot smoke. Darkness swallows him up, and he has no idea where he should go or where he is, carried by the will of his swift horses. Men think that at that time the Ethiopians had their blood drawn to the body surface and turned black, while Libya was transformed to an arid desert, all its moisture drawn off by the heat. Back then, too, the nymphs, their hair dishevelled, wept for springs and lakes. Boeotia looks for Dirce’s liquid springs, Argos for Amymone’s fountain stream, and Ephyre for Pirene’s waters.2 And even rivers held in place by banks spaced far apart are not safe—the Tanaïs (its waters in the middle give off steam!), old Peneus, Teuthrantian Caïcus, quick Ismenus, Phoecean Erymanthus, Xanthis (about to burn a second time), yellow Lycormas and Maeander, too, (whose waters play as they come twisting back), Thracian Melas, and Taenarian Eurotas. The Euphrates in Babylon caught fire, as did Orontes and swift Thermodon, 1This sequence of names refers to well-known mountains and mountain ranges: Athos in north-eastern Greece, Taurus in Asia Minor, Tmolus in Lydia, Oeta in Thessaly, Ida outside Troy, Helicon in Boeotia, Haemus in Thrace (where Orpheus, son of Oeagrus, was torn to pieces), Aetna and Eryx in Sicily, Cynthus in Delos, Rhodope in Thrace, Mimas in Ionia, Dindyma near Troy, Myclae in Caria, Cithaeron outside Thebes, Caucasus in Asia, Alps in northern Italy, Apennines in Italy.

2These are the names of famous springs in classical Greece: Dirce in Boeotia, Amymone in Argos, and Pyrene in Ephyre (Corinth).
the Ganges, Phasis, and the Ister, too.
Alpheus boils, banks of Spercheus blaze,
The gold the Tagus carries in its stream flows by on fire, and river birds, whose song made those shores in Maeonia famous, glow with heat midstream on Caýster’s waves.
Nile flees in fear to earth’s most distant place and hides his head, which still remains concealed.
Its seven mouths fill up with dust and empty, seven beds without a stream. The same fate dries up Ismarus, with Hebrus, Strymon, and western rivers, too—Rhine, Rhone, Padus, and Tiber (which has received a promise it would rule the world).¹ In every region the ground breaks up and sunlight penetrates down through the fissures right to Tartarus, alarming the ruler of the Underworld and his consort, too. The sea gets smaller.
What has recently been water now becomes a field of arid sand. Mountains covered by deep seas stand out, raising the number of the scattered Cyclades.² Fish swim down to the lowest depths, and curving dolphins do not dare to leap above the water up into the air, as is their custom.
In the sea, seals are on their backs, lying lifeless on the surface. And men report even Nereus himself, with Doris and her daughters, lay hidden in warm caves.
Three times Neptune, looking grim, attempted to extend his arms up from the waters.
Three times he could not stand the scalding air.
But fecund Earth, surrounded by the sea,
between the ocean waters and the springs, which were all shrinking, burying themselves

¹These names list a series of rivers famous in myth and history: Tanais (now called the Don) in the north, Caicus in Mysia, Ismenus in Boeotia (near Thebes), Erymanthus in Arcadia, Xanthus near Troy (which is set on fire in the Iliad, hence the reference to its burning a second time), Lycormas in Aetolia, Maeander in Phrygia (famous for its very winding course), Melas in Thrace, Thessaly, and Asia, Eurotas in Sparta, Thermophon in Cappadocia, Ganges in India, Phasis in Colchis, Ister (now called the Danube) in Europe, Alpheus in Arcadia, Tagus in Spain, Caýster in Lydia (also called Maeonia), Nile in Egypt, Strymon in Thrace, Rhine in northern Europe, Rhone in France, and Padus (now called Po) and Tiber in Italy. Ismarus is a mountain in Thrace.

²The Cyclades are a group of islands in the Aegean Sea.
in the womb of their dark mother, lifted her ravaged face, all scorched down to her neck, set her hand against her forehead, making all things shake with her powerful tremors, sunk back a little and was lower down than her usual level. In a broken voice, she said these words:

“O ruler of the gods,
if this is what you want, if this treatment is something I deserve, then why hold back your lightning? Let the power of your flames destroy me, let me perish in your fires, and let the majesty of the author of this disaster mitigate its pain.
It’s hard for me to open up my jaws to speak these words.”

(And, true enough, the heat made speaking difficult).

“Look at my hair—
it’s scorched—and all these ashes in my eyes, over my whole face. Is this the reward, the honour, you pay for my fertility and service, because I endure the wounds of the curved plough and harrow and am worked the entire year, because I provide leaves and tender nourishment for cattle herds, grass crops for the human race, and incense for you gods? Still, suppose I do deserve to be destroyed, what have the waters done?
Why does your brother deserve such treatment?
Why are those waters which chance committed to his care shrinking and moving further from the sky. But if you are not concerned about me or your brother, have pity on your own heaven. Take a look around.
Both of the poles are steaming. And if fire destroys the poles, then your own house will fall.

---

1In Greek mythology, the three brothers Zeus (Jupiter), Poseidon (Neptune), and Hades (Pluto) drew lots to determine which of them should rule particular parts of the world. Neptune drew the lot for the sea, Pluto for the Underworld, and Jupiter for the sky.
Look! Atlas himself is in great distress!
His shoulders can hardly hold up heaven—
it’s so white hot.¹ If the seas, if the earth,
if the celestal palace is destroyed,
we are thrown into primordial chaos.
Snatch from the flames whatever still remains,
and help preserve the safety of the world.”

Earth spoke. Then, unable any longer to endure the heat or keep on talking,
she pulled her face back deep within herself,
into caves closer to the dead below.

But the all-powerful father, calling gods above (and especially the god who has loaned the chariot) to bear witness how a dreadful fate will destroy all things, if he does not help out, climbs way up high,
to the very heights of heaven, from where he spreads the clouds across wide earth, stirs up thunder, and hurls his pulsing lightning bolt.
But at that time he had no clouds to drag across the land nor any rain to send down from the heavens. He thunders and hefts the lightning bolt by his right ear, hurls it at the charioteer, and, in an instant, hurls him from the chariot and from life.
With his savage fire he puts out the fires.
The horses, in their confusion, all veer in different directions, pull their necks free of the yoke, and, with the harness torn, run off. Reins lie in one spot, the axle, torn off from the pole, lies in another, spokes from the broken wheels are somewhere else,
and the remnants of the shattered chariot are scattered far and wide. But Phaëton, his golden hair consumed by fire, is thrown and carried headlong on a long pathway through the air, just as in a peaceful sky
a star sometimes seems to fall, even though

¹Atlas in Greek legend was a giant son of Iapetus. He was changed into a mountain in North Africa which supported the heavens and kept them apart from earth. For the story of his transformation see below 4.934 ff.
it has not really fallen. Far away from his own land, in a distant region of the world, Phaëton is taken in by mighty Eridanus, who cleans off his blackened face.¹ The body, still smouldering from the three-forked flame, Hesperian naiads set in a grave and mark the stone with verse:

Here lies Phaëton, who wished to guide his father’s chariot. And though he died, there was great daring in what he tried.²

But his sorrowing father, sick with grief, had concealed his face, and, so people say (if we can trust their word), one day went by without the sun. The fires provided light, so that disaster brought some benefits.
But when Clymene had said whatever needed to be said at such a time of grief, distracted in her sorrow and tearing at her breast, she roamed the entire world, seeking first his lifeless limbs and then his bones.
She found the bones, but they’d been laid to rest in a foreign riverbank. She sank down in that place and with her tears bathed the name she read there in the marble and warmed it against her naked breast. The Heliades, daughters of the sun, grieving just as much,
shed tears, vain offerings to Death, their hands beating against their chests, while night and day they cry for Phaëton (who will not hear their sad laments) and lie down on his tomb.

Four times the moon joined up her horns and filled her sphere. Those women, as was their custom (for routine has made their grief a habit), are offering their laments, when one of them, Phaëthusa, the eldest sister, wishing to throw herself down on the ground, complains her feet are growing stiff. Fair Lampetie ¹Eridanus was the name of the Po River in northern Italy.

²Tradition located the fall of Phaëton in northern Italy (hence, the naiads are from the Hesperides, meaning regions far to the west of Greece).
then tries to go to her, but is held back, suddenly rooted to the ground. A third, trying to tear her hair with both her hands, plucks out leaves. One cries that a wooden trunk now holds her legs, another that her arms are changing to long branches. While they watch, amazed at what is going on, bark grows around their groins and, by degrees, surrounds their bellies, breasts, hands, and shoulders, leaving uncovered nothing but their mouths calling for their mother. What can a mother do, other than run here and there, wherever the impulse drives her, and kiss their mouths, while she still can? But that is not enough. She tries to tear the bodies from the trees and snaps off tender branches with her hands. But drops of blood come dripping from the breaks, as though they were a wound. Whichever child is injured in this way cries out:

“Stop, mother!
Stop doing that! I'm begging you to stop!
Inside the tree my body is being torn.
Farewell.”

The bark grows over her last words, and tears flow from the place. Drops of amber, dripping from the sprouting branches, harden in the sun. Then clear streams take this amber and send it to be worn by Latian brides.¹

Cycnus, son of Sthenelus, was present at this remarkable event. And though he was related to you, Phaëton, by his mother’s blood, his feelings for you made him even closer. He abandoned his royal power (for he ruled as king of several cities in Liguria and governed people there) and filled the banks and streams of Eridanus with his cries, and the forest, too, which, with those sisters, ¹Latium was the region in Italy where Rome was situated.

had increased in size. His voice becomes shrill, white feathers hide his hair, a lengthy neck now stretches from his breast, a membrane links his reddening fingers, wings dress his sides, his mouth now sprouts a beak without a point. Cycnus has become a brand new bird—the swan. He does not trust the sky or Jupiter, for he remembers fire unjustly sent from there. So he seeks out wide ponds and pools. Hating fire, he chooses to live in streams, the enemies of flame.

Meanwhile, Phoebus, Phaëton’s father, mourning and bereft of his good looks—the way he tends to be when in eclipse—despises light, himself, and the day. His mind gives way to sorrow, and, adding anger to his grief, denies the earth his services, saying:

“My fate from the very beginning of the world had been difficult enough. I am weary of the tasks I have been carrying out. They bring no honour, and they never end. Let somebody else, anyone you like, control that chariot which brings on daylight. If no one will do that and all the gods acknowledge they cannot guide the chariot, let Jupiter do that himself. Then, at least, while he is trying out our reins, he may for a while set aside those lightning bolts which deprive fathers of their sons. Then, too, once he has experienced the power in that team of horses with hooves of fire, he will realize that the one who failed to guide them well did not deserve to die.”

All the gods are standing around the Sun as he says this, and in pleading voices

---

¹Liguria is a term referring to north Italy. The Eridanus is the Po river.
²Ovid tells three different stories of the transformation of a man called Cycnus into a swan (see also 7.600 and 12.226).
they beg him not to act on his desire to plunge the world in darkness. Jupiter also makes excuses for hurling fire, mixing his regrets with regal warnings.
Phoebus gathers up the maddened horses, still trembling with terror. Ill with grieving, he takes stick and whip and turns his rage on them (for he is still incensed), berating them and blaming them for Phaëton’s death.

The all-powerful father moves around the mighty walls of heaven, checking them, to see if any section has been harmed by the fire’s power. After he confirms they have their old solidity and strength, he looks out on the earth and works of men.
But taking care of his own Arcadia is his main concern. He restores the springs and rivers, which have not yet dared to flow, gives grass to the earth, and leaves to the trees,
and tells the injured woods to grow once more.
As he moves back and forth, he often stops to gaze at a young girl of Nonacris.
Then passions kindled in his bones would blaze.¹
She was not a girl who spent time working to soften wool by teasing it or played with stylish new arrangements for her hair.
A simple clasp held her dress together,
and ribbons kept her tangled hair in place.
Sometimes she carried a light javelin.
At other times a bow was in her hand,
for she was one of Phoebe’s warriors.
No nymph wandering on Mount Maenalus was more pleasing to the goddess Trivia.²
But no power lasts for long.

When the sun,
high in the sky, had moved past the mid-point,
the nymph went to a grove which ages past had left untouched. She set down the quiver ¹Nonacris was a city in Arcadia.

²Trivia is an epithet for the goddess Diana, who is also called Phoebe. She was worshipped in places where three roads met. Maenalus is a mountain in Arcadia.
on her shoulder, loosed her bow, and lay down on the ground in a patch of grass, setting the painted quiver underneath her neck. Jupiter spied Callisto there, tired out and with no one to protect her. He said:

“My wife, I’m sure, won’t learn of my deceit. And if she does, will that bickering of hers really matter all that much?”

Without delay, Jupiter changes face and clothes to look just like Diana and speaks up:

“Young girl, one of my companions, in what mountains did you hunt today?”

Rising from the grass, Callisto says:

“Greetings to you, goddess greater than Jupiter! I make that claim though he himself may hear me!”

Jupiter does hear and laughs, delighted that she thinks he is greater than himself. He kisses her, but not modestly, the way one ought to kiss a virgin. She is ready to describe where she has just been hunting in the woods, but he embraces her to halt her story and, to get what he desires, commits a crime. She does fight back, as much as women can. How I wish you had observed them, Juno! You would have been much kinder to the girl. But how could a young nymph conquer Jupiter? Could anyone do that? Once he has his way, Jupiter ascends to heaven above. But now Callisto hates the forest (for the trees are aware of what she’s done). As she leaves the place, she almost forgets to collect her arrows in their quiver and the bow suspended there.
Lo and behold,
goddess Diana with her companions,
on her way over lofty Mount Maenalus, proud of the creatures she had hunted down, glimpsed Callisto and, having seen the nymph, called out to her. Callisto fled the call, afraid at first the goddess might well be Jupiter in disguise. But when she saw there were nymphs with her as well, she sensed there was no trick involved and joined their group.
Alas, how difficult it is not to show one has done wrong by how one looks! She finds it hard to raise her eyes up from the ground.
She is not tied to the goddess’s side,
pre-eminent in that whole company,
the way she was before, but keeps silent,
and by blushing indicates her honour has been shamed. If Diana had not been a virgin, she would have learned about her guilt from a thousand clues. People say the nymphs all noticed it.

When the crescent moon
was rising once again, nine orbits later,
the goddess, tired from hunting in the light of the Sun, her brother, entered a cool grove where a stream flowed with a rippling murmur, rolling the fine-grained sand. She praised the spot, touching the surface waters with her foot.
Commending these as well, she then remarked:

“All witnesses are far away. Let’s bathe our naked bodies in the flowing stream.”

Callisto was embarrassed. All the nymphs took off their clothes. She was the only one who tried to hold things up. Reluctantly she took her garment off. When she did that,
her body, now exposed, revealed her shame.
She desperately tried to hide her belly with her hands. Diana said: BOOK TWO

“Go away—
far from this place. Do not contaminate the sacred springs.”

And she commanded her
to leave their company.

For some time, Juno,
the great Thunderer’s wife, had known all this,
but was postponing any punishment until the time was right. And now there seemed no reason to delay. For Callisto had already given birth to a young boy, Arcas. That, too, really angered Juno, who thought she was a slut. So when she turned her eye and savage mind onto the child,
she cried:

“That’s the only thing that’s missing, you adulteress! You would be fertile and publicly proclaim the injury by giving birth and thus acknowledging the disgrace to Jupiter, my consort.
You wretched girl, you’ll get your punishment.
I’ll take away that shape of yours, which gave you and my husband such delight.”

Juno spoke.

She grabbed Callisto’s hair above her forehead and threw her face down on the ground. The nymph stretched out her arms in supplication, but then rough black hair began to sprout on both her arms,
her hands curved inward, changing to bent claws, and served as feet. Her mouth, which Jupiter had earlier praised, became distended and formed a massive jaw. In case her prayers and passionate words might move his feelings, Juno takes away her power to speak.
The voice which issues from her rauous throat is threatening, angry, full of menace.
Her mind still works the way it did before,
though she has now been changed into a bear.
She expresses her grief with constant groans, raising her hands (such as they are) to heaven, and even though she cannot speak of it, she feels great Jupiter’s indifference. O how often she was too afraid to sleep in the solitary woods and wandered beside the fields and home that once before had been her own! How often barking dogs drove her across the rocks, and the huntress ran off in terror, fearful of the hunt. And often, when she saw wild beasts, she hid, forgetting what she was. She was a bear, and yet she trembled when she saw a bear up in the mountains. Wolves made her afraid, though Lycaon, her father, was among them.¹

Now, Lycaon’s grown up grandson Arcas, almost fifteen years old, was unaware of his own mother. While he was chasing wild beasts, selecting suitable thickets, and setting his woven nets to enclose the Erymanthian woods, he met her.² His mother saw Arcas and stopped, as if she recognized him. Not knowing who she was, he moved back, worried that she kept her eyes, which never wavered, staring right at him. When she wished to move in closer to him, he was about to jab her with his spear, a lethal weapon, but great Jupiter intervened, by removing both of them (and the chance a crime might be committed). Together they were seized and carried off through empty space by a tremendous wind and placed in the sky as neighbouring stars.³

When Juno saw that girl of Jupiter’s shining among the stars, she swelled with rage and went down into the sea to visit white-haired Tethys and old Oceanus, a pious couple whom the gods revere.⁴

¹For the story of Lycaon, see 1.297 ff. above.
²Erymanthia is a mountain in Arcadia.
³They became the Great Bear and Little Bear constellations.
⁴Tethys and Oceanus are brother and sister, as well as husband and wife. They are children of the original gods, Ouranos and Gaia.
When they asked the reason for her journey, she answered them:

“You are asking why I, queen of the gods, leave my celestial home to come here? Another woman now sits in heaven in my place. I do not lie! Once night comes and clothes the world in darkness, you will observe some recent stars designed to wound me, honoured by the highest place in heaven, up there where the most distant and the smallest circle in space orbits the furthest pole. But why would anyone not wish to injure Juno or worry about offending me—the ones I harm I only benefit. Just look how much I have achieved! How vast my powers are! I stopped her being human, and she is made a goddess! That’s the sort of punishment I inflict on evildoers! That shows my great authority! Let him remove her savage creature’s shape and then restore the way she looked before, just as he did earlier with Io, that Argive girl.¹ Why should he now not get rid of Juno, wed the girl, set her in my marriage bed, and take Lycaon for his father-in-law? But if this slur to your scorned foster child affects you, then make sure the seven stars of that constellation are kept away from your dark-blue waters.² Repel those stars which have been given a place in heaven to reward their fornication. Make sure that whore will never bathe in the pure sea.”³

The gods of the sea agreed to her request. Then Saturn’s daughter moves up to clear air, her light chariot drawn by painted peacocks, which have only recently been coloured, ¹For the story of Io see 1.865 ff. above.

²In Greek mythology, Juno was raised by Tethys and Oceanus and is thus their foster child.
³At the latitude of the Mediterranean, the stars of the Bear constellations do not disappear below the horizon (i.e., bathe in the sea), but are visible through their whole orbit.
at the time that Argus died, that moment when you, chattering Raven, not long since had your wings altered suddenly to black, although before that time you were pure white.
Earlier this bird had silver plumage with snow-white wings, its colour rivalling spotless doves, yielding nothing to those geese whose watchful cries would save the Capitol, or to river-loving swans.' But its tongue betrayed it—that chattering voice changed things, so what was white is now white's opposite.

In all Haemonia no one was lovelier than Coronis of Larissa.
For you, god of Delphi, she was, beyond all doubt, delightful, as long as she was faithful or unobserved. But that bird of Phoebus, an inveterate informer, spied out her infidelity and winged his way to tell his master of her hidden crime.
The chattering Crow flew after him
on flapping wings, to find out everything, and once he heard about the Raven's trip,
he said:

"This journey you are going on will be no use. Do not spurn prophecies my voice delivers. Think of what I was and what I am. Ask if I deserve it.
You will find that the loyalty I showed has done me harm. For once upon a time, Pallas placed Erichthonius (a child conceived without a mother) in a box of woven willow twigs from Actaea.
She gave this box to the three virgin girls of double-natured Cecrops, telling them

---

1In a famous story from the early history of Rome some geese on the Capitoline Hill heard an enemy army approaching and warned the garrison in time to save the city.
2Larissa is a city in Thessaly (Haemonia).
3The bird of Phoebus Apollo is the raven.
4Pallas is a common name for Athena or Minerva. Actaea is an early name for Attica, the region around Athens. Erichthonius was born from the soil, when some of Vulcan's sperm dripped onto the ground.
they were not to snoop into her secret.¹
I was concealed in the light foliage of a thick elm, observing what they did.
Two of the girls, Herse and Pandrosus,
did not cheat and followed their instructions.
But Aglauros calls her sisters cowards.
Her hands untie the knots. Inside the box they see a baby and there beside him is a snake stretched out. I tell the goddess what those girls have done. And for my trouble this is the thanks I get—I am informed
I no longer have Minerva’s patronage.
I am being expelled, and my position is now below the owl, the bird of night.² My punishment should warn birds to beware of running into danger when they talk.
In my view, she had come searching for me all on her own. I was not requesting any favours from her. You can ask her all about this. Pallas may be angry, but even in a rage she won’t deny it.
Famous Coroneus was my father in the land of Phocis (what I’m saying is well known). I was a royal virgin, and rich suitors sought my hand in marriage (so don’t belittle me). But my beauty was my downfall. Once when I was walking along the sea shore, strolling leisurely across the sand, the way I used to do,
a sea god noticed me and grew inflamed.
After wasting time with flattering words, trying to seduce me, he is ready to use force. He comes at me. I run off, leaving the firm shore, and exhaust myself, quite uselessly, in softer sand. From there I appeal to gods and men, but my voice does not reach any human ear. And then, a virgin god was moved to help a virgin.
As I stretched my arms up to the heavens, those arms started to turn dark, all covered

¹Cecrops, an ancient king of Athens, had two natures because he was part man and part fish (or serpent).
²Minerva is the Roman equivalent to the Greek goddess Athena. The name Pallas is frequently used instead of either name.
with light feathers. I tried to shift my robe down from my shoulders, but it had now become more feathers, deeply rooted in my skin.
I made an effort to beat my naked breasts with my own hands, but by this time I had no hands, nor any naked breasts. I ran, and the soft sand did not drag at my feet
the way it had before. I was raised up, above the surface of the ground, and soon was borne aloft, transported through the air.
I was made an innocent companion to Minerva. What use is that to me, if Nyctimene, who became a bird thanks to her dreadful crime, has now assumed my honours? Or have you not heard the tale (it’s common knowledge everywhere in Lesbos)
how Nyctimene stained her father’s bed?² Yes, she is a bird, but she understands her guilt and flies away from human eyes.
She conceals her shame in darkness. And now all birds have banished her from all the heavens.”

Once the Crow says this, the Raven answers:

“I hope that your attempt to call me back turns out bad for you. Empty prophecies are something I despise.”

With that, the Raven
continued on the journey he had started and told his master he had seen Coronis lying beside a lad from Thessaly.
When Apollo, her lover, heard the charge,
the laurel wreath fell off his head. All at once, the god’s face and colour fell—his lyre, too.
Heart seething with swelling anger, he seized his usual weapons. He pulled back on his bow until the tips were bent and, with a shaft which never missed its target, pierced those breasts so often pressed against his own. The girl, struck by the arrow, groaned. As it was pulled ¹Nyctimene, daughter of the king of Lesbos, had sex with her father and, in shame, hid in the forest. Minerva pitied her, changed her into an owl, and made the owl her favourite bird.

out of her wound, her fair white limbs were soaked in scarlet blood. She cried out:

“O Phoebus,
you could have let me give birth to my child before you punished me. Now in one death two people die.”

Those were her last words.

Then her life and blood poured out together,
and icy death crept up her lifeless corpse.

Her lover now regrets his murderous act—
alas, too late!—and then he hates himself for listening to the tale and growing so enraged. He hates the bird that forced him to learn about the fault and caused his grief.
He hates his hand and bow, and, with that hand, those rash weapons, too, his arrows. He strokes her, where she collapsed, and with his curing arts he tries to stave off Fate. But he is too late.
The healing skills he used have no effect.
Once he saw that these attempts were futile and that a funeral pyre had been prepared to burn her body in a final blaze, then indeed Apollo gave out a groan produced from somewhere deep inside his heart (for tears are not permitted to flow down celestial faces), a cry of grief and pain just like a young cow makes when she beholds the slaughterer raise his murderous axe to his right ear and, with a splintering sound, smash in the temples of her suckling calf.
Phoebus reluctantly poured incense out onto her breast, embraced her, and finished the rites which were her due, although her death was far from just. But Phoebus could not bear that his own child fall in those same ashes.
He ripped his son out of his mother’s womb, right from the fire, and took him to the cave of Chiron, a creature with a double form.¹

¹Chiron is a centaur, with the body and legs of a horse and the torso, head, and arms of a human being. The child’s name is Aesculapius. He became a very famous healer and later a god in Rome (see below 15.939 ff.).
As for the Raven, who was expecting to get a fine reward, because his tongue had spoken the truth, Apollo told him he was no longer to be included among birds coloured white.

Meanwhile, Chiron,
half-beast, half-man, pleased with a foster son whose parent was a god, took great delight in the obligation and the honour.
Then, lo and behold, the centaur’s daughter comes to him, her red hair cascading down across her shoulders. The nymph Chariclo, some time past, had named her Ocyrhoe, because she gave birth to the baby girl beside a swift stream with that name. And now, not content with knowing her father’s arts, Ocyrhoe sang the secrets of the Fates.
So when, possessed by frenzied prophecies, hers mind had grown hot from the god enclosed inside her heart, she gazed at the infant child and cried:

“Grow up, young boy, bringer of health to all the world. Mortal men will often be in your debt, and you will be allowed to bring back life once it has been removed.
But if you dare to do that even once against the wishes of the gods, then flames from your grandfather’s lightning bolt will end your power—you’ll not possess it any more—and from being a god you will be turned into a bloodless corpse, then to a god, after being, some time before, quite dead, thus changing your fate twice. You too, dear father, now immortal and, by those laws set down when you were born, created to live on though all the ages, you will want to die
when you are being tormented by the blood of that dreadful serpent, which you’ll absorb through wounded limbs.1 The gods will alter you.

1The serpent whose blood will make Chiron suffer is the Hydra, a famous monster with many heads. The blood was used as poison on a weapon which injured Chiron.
From an eternal being you will change to someone who can suffer death, and then,
those three fatal goddesses will cut your thread.”

She still has to speak about some details of their fates. But from the depths of her heart she sighs, begins to weep, and then the tears run down her cheeks. She cries out:

“The Fates
stand in my way and tell me not to speak another word—I may not use my voice.
The arts which bring down on me the anger of the gods are not worth much. How I wish I had never known about the future!
Now my human shape seems to be going.
Now grass delights me as a food, and now my instinct is to run in the wide fields.
I am being changed into a mare, a shape linked to my family. But why completely?
For my father is half horse, half human.”

She spoke some words like these, but the last part of her complaint was hard to understand.
The words were so confused. And afterwards, they did not sound like words or horses’ neighs,
but like an imitation of a horse.
A short time later, she gave out real neighs, and her arms moved in the grass. Her fingers then fused together, and one smooth hoof joined five finger nails with solid horn. Her mouth and neck grew larger. Most of her long cloak became a tail, and her free-flowing hair fell on her neck and changed into a mane on her right side. And then her voice and shape, were both instantaneously transformed.
As a result of this amazing change, she also got another name.¹

Chiron,
semi-divine son of Philyra, wept

¹The new name, not mentioned here by Ovid, is Enippe.
and called to you, Apollo, for your help. But you could not overturn the orders of great Jupiter, and if you could have, you were not present at the time, but living in Elis and Messenian lands. Back then, you wore a shepherd’s clothing made of skins, with a wild olive stick in your left hand, and in your right a pipe with seven reeds of unequal lengths. While that pipe’s music was soothing you and love was on your mind, your cattle, so the story goes, wandered unguarded into the land of Pylos. Mercury, son of Maia, Atlas’ daughter, up to his usual tricks, stole the herd and hid it in the woods. No one observed the theft, except for an old man, well known throughout that land, where, in every region, men called him Battus. He was a herdsman, who tended the grassy fields and pastures of wealthy Neleus and catered to his herds of well-bred mares. Now Mercury, concerned about this man, took him aside with a flattering hand and said:

“Stranger, whoever you are, if, by chance, anyone should ask about these animals, just say you haven’t seen them. And to make quite sure you get some recompense for what you’ve done, take this glistening heifer as your reward.”

Mercury offered him the cow. The stranger took it, pointed to a stone, and answered:

“Go on your way, and rest assured. That stone will talk about your theft before I do.”

Jupiter’s son pretended he had left, but came back with an altered shape and voice. He spoke to Battus:

---

1Philyra is a nymph. Chiron’s father is Saturn, father of Jupiter.
2There are at least three cities called Pylos, all in the Peloponnese.
3Neleus is king of Pylos.
“You there, countryman, if you’ve caught sight of any cattle here, along this path, help me. Don’t keep quiet about those stolen beasts. I’ll offer you a cow and her own bull as a reward.”

The old man, with the reward now doubled, answered:

“nThe cattle will be over there, below those hills.”

And that was where they were. The grandson of Atlas chuckled and said:

“Liar! Will you betray me to myself, telling me things to inform against me?”

And he changed the perjured chest of Battus to solid flint, which is called, even now, the touchstone, and this old disgrace is linked to stone that has not merited the slur.

The god who carries the caduceus took himself from this place on matching wings, and, as he flew, gazed down upon the fields in Munychia, on land so pleasing to Minerva, and on the well-tilled groves of Mount Lycaeus.¹ On that day, by chance, chaste young girls, according to their custom, carried pure, sacred objects on their heads in baskets crowned with flowers, on their way to the festive citadel of Pallas. The winged god sees them coming back from there. He does not direct his course right at them, but wheels in circles. And just as a hawk, swiftest of all birds, when it sees entrails but is still timid, since the attendants stand in a dense crowd beside the sacrifice, circles around, not venturing to fly any further off, and with beating wings

¹Munychia is a small piece of land close to Athens. The caduceus is the special messenger’s staff carried by Mercury. It is commonly depicted as having two snakes entwined around it and a pair of wings at the top.
keeps moving greedily around the food it hopes to seize—that’s how the agile god from Mount Cyllene angles his flight then above Actaean heights and circles there in the same airy breezes. And just as Lucifer shines brighter than the other stars and golden Phoebe more than Lucifer, that how much Herse, as she walked along, was lovelier than all the virgin girls. Among her comrades in that procession she was pre-eminent. Jupiter’s son, astounded by her beauty, hovered there, in the air, growing hot with love, the way a lead ball shot from a Balearic sling gets hotter as it flies and, below the clouds, discovers heat it did not have before.¹ He shifts his course, moving down from heaven and making for the earth, with no attempt to change the way he looks—he has such faith in his own beauty. But still, even though that beauty is complete, he takes the time to tidy himself up. He smooths his hair and tugs his cloak to hang the way it should to show the fringe and all the golden thread. In his right hand he holds his magic wand, with which he brings on sleep or drives it off, and on the god’s trim feet winged sandals gleam.

Deep inside the house were three rooms adorned with ivory and tortoiseshell. In these, Pandrosus lived on the right, Aglauros on the left, and Herse had the middle. The girl who occupies the left-hand room sees Mercury first, as he approaches, and goes to ask the god who he might be and why he has come there. Answering her, the grandson of Atlas and Pleione says:

“I am the one who carries through the air what my father orders—and my father is Jupiter himself. I will not lie about why I am here. Just be willing ¹The Balearic Islands are near the coast of Spain. The residents were well known for their use of the sling.

to help your sister out and to be called my young child’s aunt. The reason I am here is Herse. I’m asking you to help out someone who’s in love.”

Aглаuros looks at him
through the same eyes with which, not long ago, she had pried into the hidden secrets of golden-haired Minerva, then asks him to give her, in return for her assistance, a heavy weight of gold. In the meantime, she demands he leave the house.¹

Minerva,
the warrior goddess, turns her fierce eyeballs on the girl. From deep inside her, she heaves a sigh with such emotion that her heart and the aegis resting on her sturdy chest both shake.² Her mind remembers that this girl with profane hands has earlier revealed her secrets when, contravening orders
she had been given, she looked at the child Erichthonius, offspring of the god who inhabits Lemnos, an infant born without a mother.³ And now her sister and the god will both be grateful to her.
She will be rich, as well, once she receives the gold demanded by her avarice.

Minerva leaves at once for Envy’s home,
a filthy, black, corrupted place. The house, crouched in the lowest fissures of a cave,
with no sunlight, closed off from every wind,
is depressing and filled with numbing cold,
always lacking fire, always in the dark.
When the fearful warrior goddess gets there, she stops before the house (for she believes it is not right to go beneath its roof)

¹For the story of Aглаuros and Minerva see above 2.815 ff.
²The aegis is a special divine shield, which has the power to terrify human beings and make them run away. It is commonly associated with Jupiter and Minerva.
³Erichthonius was produced from the sperm of Vulcan, god of the forge, who is associated with Lemnos. His semen fell into the earth, as a result of which Erichthonius was created. and hammers on the doorpost with her spear. The doors shake and then fly open. She sees Envy inside the house eating the flesh of vipers, which nurtures her corruption. Minerva looks and turns her eyes away. But Envy gets up slowly from the ground, leaving the bodies of half-eaten snakes, shuffles forward, and peers out at the goddess, at her lovely shape and splendid weapons. Her face distorts. Then she groans and gives off the heaviest sigh. There is a pallor smeared across her face, her entire body is gaunt, her eyesight squints at everything, her teeth are mouldy with decay, her heart is green with bile, and her tongue drips poison. She never laughs, except when she responds to the sight of grieving, and never sleeps, for gnawing cares keep her awake. She hates to witness men's success—the sight of it makes her waste away. She tortures others and, in that very moment, is tormented and punishes herself. Though Tritonia hated Envy, she spoke briefly to her, saying:

“Infect one of Cecrops’ daughters with your poison. That is a task for you. Aglauros is the one.”

With no more words, she left, pushing her spear into the earth and springing upward.

Envoy, eyes askew, saw the goddess rush away, muttered softly, unhappy that Minerva would succeed, picked up a staff completely wrapped in thorns, and, shrouded by black clouds, went on her way. Wherever she goes, she tramples down fields full of flowers, burns the grass, plucks the tops of growing plants, and with her breath pollutes cities and homes, entire communities.

---

1Tritonia is another name for Minerva. It is not clear what it means (perhaps it is a reference to the place where she is supposed to have been born).
At last, Envy sees Tritonia’s city, so rich in intelligence, resources, and joyful peace.¹ She finds it difficult to hold back tears because she cannot see a single thing to cry about. She goes in the home of Cecrops’ daughter and performs what she’s been ordered, touching the girl’s breast with a rust-stained hand and filling her heart with spiky thorns. She blows in harmful poison, spreading black venom through her bones and lungs. And to make sure the causes of her pain do not wander far away, she places before her eyes visions of her sister, her sister’s happy marriage, and the god whose outer form is so magnificent, enlarging every detail. Aglauros, Cecrops’ daughter, tormented by all this, eaten up by hidden sorrow, groaning, racked with pain at night and with pain by day, wasting miserably from slow disease, like ice melting from uncertain sunlight, is burned by joyful Herse’s happy fate, just as a fire placed under thorny plants which emit no flames, burns with a low heat. Often she wished to die, so that she might stop watching what was going on, often to tell everything to her stern father, as if it were a crime. Then finally, to keep the god from entering the house, as he approached, she sat down by the door. When he spoke flattering words, wished her well, and used his gentlest tone, she said:

“Stop that!
I am not going to move myself from here till you are sent away.

The swift god
from Cyllene answered:

¹Tritonia’s city is Athens.
BOOK TWO

“Let us make that a pact between us.”

With his magic wand
he opened the sculpted doors. Aglauros attempted to get up but could not move the parts she bent when she sat down. Her limbs were numb and sluggish. She really struggled to raise herself and hold her body straight, but her knees were locked, and an icy cold was spreading through her nails. Her veins were pale and had lost their blood. And just as cancer, an incurable disease, tends to spread far and wide and to transport the illness to undamaged parts, so a lethal chill by degrees moved to her chest, closing off her breathing and her vital passageways.

She made no attempt to speak—if she had,
there would have been no channel for her voice.
By now stone had seized her neck, and her mouth grew hard. There she sat, a bloodless statue—but not white stone, for her mind had stained her.¹

When the grandson of Atlas has imposed this punishment for what Aglauros said and for her profane mind, he leaves the land named after Pallas and, spreading his wings, goes up into the aether. His father calls him aside and, without revealing what he wants (because he is in love), declares:

“My son, faithful servant of my commands,
do not delay, but with your usual speed, glide down, and make for that land which gazes at your mother’s star from the left hand side.²
The natives call it Sidon. You’ll observe a royal herd of cattle grazing there, some distance off, on mountain grasses.
Take those animals towards the seashore.”

¹We learn no more from Ovid about Mercury and Herse. In some traditional myths they have a child, Cephalus, whose story appears later in Ovid’s poem (in Book 7).
²Mercury’s mother, Maia, is one of the seven stars in the constellation of the Pleiades.
BOOK TWO

Jupiter spoke. The herd, by now driven from the mountains, was moving to the shore, as Jupiter had bid. There Europa, daughter of a mighty king, used to play, accompanied by Tyrian virgins.¹ Majesty and love do not fit well together and do not long remain in the same house.
So the father and ruler of the gods,
whose right hand is armed with triple lightning,
who, by nodding his head, can shake the world, sets aside his weighty sceptre, takes on the appearance of a bull, and then joins that cattle herd. Looking magnificent,
he lows and wanders through the tender grass.
His colour is like snow which no rough foot has stepped in and left an imprint and which the watery South Wind has not melted.
Muscles bulge around his neck, his dewlap hangs down from his shoulders, his horns are bent, but you would think they had been made by hand, brighter than a perfect gem. His forehead holds no threats, and there is nothing fearful in his eye. He has a calm expression.
Europa, Agenor’s daughter, amazed
he is so lovely and unthreatening, at first is fearful about touching him,
for all his mildness. But soon she comes up holding out bunched flowers for his shining mouth.
The lover feels great joy. Until the time the pleasure he is hoping for arrives, he kisses her hands. He finds it difficult, (O so difficult!) to postpone the rest.
Sometimes he plays and runs through the green grass,
and sometimes he sets down his snow-white side on the yellow sand. Little by little, Europa’s fear subsides. Now he offers his chest for the virgin’s hand to stroke and now his horns for her to decorate with fresh-picked flowers. The royal maiden even attempts to ride astride the bull, not knowing she is sitting on a god,
who gradually, as he moves from the land

¹Tyre is a coastal city close to Sidon in Asia Minor.
and from the dry seashore, sets the false hooves
on his feet in sea waves by the water's edge.
From there he moves in further, carrying his prize across the middle of the sea.
Terrified at being abducted, the girl looks back to the shore she has abandoned, clutching one of his horns in her right hand and bracing the other hand along his back.
Winds keep tugging at her trembling garments.
BOOK III

[Cadmus searches for Europa; he consults Apollo, who tells him to follow a heifer; Cadmus fights and kills the dragon, sows the dragon’s teeth; warriors spring up and fight; Cadmus founds Thebes; Actaeon sees Diana naked, is changed into a stag, and ripped apart by his dogs; Juno tricks and kills Semele; birth of Bacchus; Juno and Jupiter argue about sex, agree to consult Teiresias; how Teiresias became a woman and then a man again; Juno blinds Teiresias, Jupiter gives him the gift of prophecy; Narcissus and Echo; Juno punishes Echo; Narcissus rejects Echo; suffering of Echo; Narcissus changes sailors into dolphins; Pentheus is killed.]

By now Jupiter, discarding the form of a deceiving bull, has revealed himself and reached the land of Crete. In the meantime, Europa’s father, who has no knowledge of what has taken place, orders Cadmus to look for the abducted girl, saying that he will punish him with banishment if he does not find her, thus revealing both his piety and his wickedness in the selfsame act. So Agenor’s son wanders the world (for who can uncover Jupiter’s secret plans?). By running off, he stays away from his own native land and his father’s rage. As a suppliant, he seeks advice from Phoebus’ oracle and asks what country he should settle in. Phoebus says:

“In uninhabited fields a cow will meet you, one that has never felt the yoke and has no experience of the curving plough. With her to guide you, choose your path, and wherever she lies down on the grass, construct walls for your city, and give that region the name Boeotia.”

Cadmus has scarcely gone down from that cave beside Castalius when he sees a cow moving slowly without a guard, showing

---

1Europa’s father is Agenor, king of Sidon, in Asia Minor. Cadmus is her brother.
on her neck no signs of being harnessed.\(^1\)
He follows, closely tracking where she goes,
and pays tribute silently to Phoebus,
who instructed him to make this journey.
Once he has passed the fords of Cephisus and fields of Panope, the heifer stops.\(^2\) Raising her wide forehead and long horns up to the heavens, with her lowing sounds she makes the air vibrate and, looking back at her companions following behind, she lies down on her side and rests there, on the tender grass. Cadmus then gives thanks, kissing the foreign soil and saluting the unknown hills and fields.

Intending now
to offer Jupiter a sacrifice,
he orders servants to bring up water from a flowing stream for a libation.
An ancient grove stands there, as yet untouched by any human hand. It has a cave in the middle, thickly covered with twigs and willow sticks, creating a low arch with the adjoining rocks. A rich supply of water is there, too. In this cavern is hidden a serpent sacred to Mars, with golden skin distinguished by its crests.
Its eyes are gleaming fire, its whole body is puffed with poison, and its three-forked tongue flickers beside teeth set in triple rows.
When that race of men from Tyre directed their ill-fated footsteps into this grove and a jar they set down in the water made a noise, from deep within the cavern
the dark green serpent stuck its head outside with a fearful hissing noise. The jars fall out of the men’s hands, blood leaves their bodies, and their astonished limbs immediately begin to shake. Twisting its scaly coils into rolling circles and with one leap bending itself up in an enormous arc,

\(^1\)Castalius is a fountain near Delphi, below Mount Parnassus, in central Greece.
\(^2\)Cephisus is a river flowing through Boeotia. Panope is a town in Phocis.
it raises more than half its body length up in the air and looks at the whole grove.
Its body, viewed as a totality, is as huge as that Serpent in the sky which separates the Great and Little Bears.\(^1\)
It does not hesitate but charges out, straight at those Phoenicians, whether they wish to fight or flee or whether instant panic hinders them from both. The beast then slaughters some with bites, some in prolonged embraces, and others by breathing deathly poison which destroys them.

The sun, now at its height, had made the shadows small. Agenor’s son wondered what was holding up his comrades.
He set off searching for the men, covered with skins stripped from a lion, carrying a lance of gleaming iron, a javelin, and a heart more firm than any weapon.
He went in the grove and saw the corpses of his butchered men and the enemy, their conqueror, with its monstrous body,
as its bloody tongue licked their dreadful wounds.
He cried:

“Either I will avenge your deaths,
my faithful comrades, or I will share it.”

With these words, in his right hand he raised up a huge rock and, with tremendous effort, hurled the massive weight. High walls with towers would shake under the impact of that stone, but the dragon was not hurt. Protected by its scales, which were like a coat of mail, and by the hardness of its murky hide, its skin repelled the heavy blow. But still,
that same protective hide cannot prevail against the javelin which stands firmly fixed in the centre of its curving, supple spine, with the whole iron point skewering its gut.
Writhing in pain and twisting its head round

\(^1\)The Serpent is a constellation in the northern sky.
towards its back, the beast looks at the wound and bites down on the impaled javelin. Its huge strength loosens it on every side and then, with a great effort, rips the shaft out of its back, but leaves the iron point stuck in its bones. And then, when a fresh blow has increased the force of its usual rage, the swollen veins in its throat grow bloated, white foam flecks its man-killing jaws, the earth echoes from the scraping scales, and the breath pumping from its black Stygian mouth poisons the infected air. At times the serpent coils itself in massive circles, at times it rears up straighter than a lengthy plank, and sometimes it charges on relentlessly, like rivers fully roused by falling rain, its chest flattening trees which block its way. Agenor’s son backs off a little, blocking the attack with his lion’s hide, checking the menacing jaws by thrusting the spear in front of him. The serpent, mad with rage, tries in vain to wound the tempered iron, but its teeth break on the metal. By now, from that dragon’s venomous gullet, blood is already dripping out. Its spatter stains the grassy turf. But the wound is slight. It moves back from the blow, pulling away its wounded throat, and by retreating stops the spear thrust sinking any deeper and does not let it penetrate too far. So Agenor’s son, always in pursuit, keeps shoving the iron spear lodged in its throat, until an oak tree blocks the beast’s retreat and he can jam the spear right through its neck into the wood. The beast’s enormous weight bends the tree, which groans as the very tip of the serpent’s tail beats against its trunk.

While the victor was looking at the size of the enemy he had overcome, suddenly a voice rang out (it was hard to tell where it was coming from, but still, Cadmus heard it):
BOOK THREE

“Son of Agenor,
why are you staring at that serpent’s corpse?
You, too, will be a snake men gaze upon.”

For a while, Cadmus trembles, his colour and his confidence are gone, while his hair in chill terror stands on end. Then, behold, Pallas is there, the hero’s guardian,
after gliding down from the air above.
She orders him to open up the earth and sow the dragon’s teeth into the ground, to ensure the growth of future people.
He obeys. After he has sunk a plough into the soil and carved a furrow there, deep in that earth he sows the dragon’s teeth,
the seeds of mortals, as he was ordered.
What happened then was quite beyond belief.
Lumps of earth began to move, and spear points
first appeared to rise up from the furrows, then, a short time later, heads with helmets and nodding painted crests, then shoulder blades and chests emerged, as well as limbs weighed down with weapons. A crop of men armed with shields sprang up—just as in drama festivals when curtains are pulled up, the figures there usually rise, show their faces first,
and then, little by little, other parts,
so every form moves up in peaceful order,
until the lower margin shows their feet.¹

Cadmus, frightened by a new enemy, holds his weapons ready, but one of those created from the earth cries out:

“Stand back,
and do not interfere in civil war!”

That said, in a combat settled hand-to-hand he runs at one of his earth-born brothers and strikes him with his cruel sword. But then,

¹Riley notes that the theatre curtain, which contained designs with human figures on it, was lowered to the floor to start a performance and raised again at the end. The process described here is the gradual raising of the curtain at the end of the play.
he himself is cut down by a javelin thrown from far away. The man who killed him does not survive. He dies, gasping for air, just moments after he began to breathe.
In the same way, the whole crowd of warriors is in a frenzy, and these brothers born a minute ago are being butchered in their own battle from wounds inflicted on one another. Now those youthful men, whom Fate had granted such a short life span,
were hammering at the sorrowful heart of their bloodstained mother. Five men were left, and one was Echion. On the advice of the Tritonian deity, he threw his weapons down on the ground, requesting and pledging tokens of fraternal peace.¹ Thus, Cadmus, a foreigner from Sidon, had these men as his comrades in the work, when he carried out what Phoebus ordered and founded his new city.

Thebes was now built,
and you, Cadmus, would seem to be happy in your exile: Venus and Mars were now your in-laws, and add to this the family from such a noble wife, so many sons and daughters, and those dear assurances of grandchildren, already youthful men.²
But there is no doubt we should always wait for someone’s final day and call no man content before he’s dead and laid to rest.
The first reasons for your sorrow, Cadmus,
in the midst of so much prosperity,
were your grandson, Actaeon, whose forehead had strange horns attached to it and you, too, his hunting dogs, who gorged yourselves on blood from your own master. But if one inquires with all due care, one finds the blame for that in chance, not in some wicked act he did.
What crime is there is making a mistake?

¹The Tritonian deity is Pallas, i.e., Minerva.
²Cadmus’s wife is Harmonia, the daughter of Venus and Mars.
There is a mountain, bloody with the slaughter of various wild beasts. By now shadows have contracted under the mid-day light and the sun is at an equal distance from each end of its path, when Actaeon, the young lad from Hyantia, speaks out in a friendly way to the companions in his hunting group, as they make their way through secluded undergrowth:

“Friends, these nets and spears are dripping with wild creatures' blood. Our good luck today has been sufficient. When a new dawn appears on golden wheels and brings back daylight, let us continue the task we have proposed. Right now, Phoebus is poised halfway between the east and west, and his heat is opening up the fields. So stop what you are doing, and remove the knotted nets.”

His comrades carry out what he has asked and then rest from their work.

There was a valley men called Gargaphia, thick with pine and sharp-pointed cypress trees, sacred to Diana, who wears her tunic tucked high up on her legs. Deep in this place, there is a wooded cave, not formed by art, for nature with her own ingenuity has imitated art, by tracing out a natural arch of native limestone rock and lighter sandstone. A sparkling fountain pool of limpid water murmurs on the right, and grassy banks enclose its open streams. Here the forest goddess, when exhausted from her hunting, would bathe her virgin limbs in the clear waters. Once she reached the place,

---

1 The Hyantes were the original inhabitants of Boeotia, the region in which Thebes was built. Hence, the term is equivalent here to Boeotia.

2 Nets were commonly used in hunting. The animals would be driven into them, and the hunters would kill them once they became entangled.

3 Gargaphia is near Plataea, a region in Boeotia.
She would give one of her armed nymphs her spear, quiver, and unstrung bow. Another nymph held in her arms the robe she'd taken off, while two undid the sandals on her feet. Then a Theban girl, Croale, who was more skillful than the rest, tied up the hair tangled across her neck, into a knot, though she herself kept her hair hanging down. Nephele, Hyale, Rhanis, Psecas, and Phiale fetched water in large jars and poured it out.

While the Titanian goddess is bathing there in her usual stream, lo and behold, Actaeon arrives there, at that very spot.¹ He has set aside his hunting and is wandering around the unknown wood, uncertain where he is. The Fates have led him there. Once he enters the cave watered by those springs, all the nymphs, naked as they are, once they see a man, beat their breasts and fill the entire forest with their sudden cries, rushing to surround and conceal Diana with their bodies. But the goddess herself, who is taller, stands there head and shoulders above them all. Since she was being watched without her clothes, Diana's face changed colour to the blush one sees quite commonly when clouds are struck by sunlight from an opposite direction or by the purple dawn. And though a crowd of her companions was standing round her, she turned sideways and twisted her head back. How she wished she had her arrows with her! But she did have water. She scooped some up and splashed it in Actaeon's face, sprinkling his hair with her avenging drops, adding words which prophesied his future ruin:

"Now you may say you have seen me naked, if you still retain the power of speech!"

¹The adjective Titanian means "related to the Titans." It is commonly applied to Diana, although she was not a Titan but a daughter of Jupiter.
Without any further threats, she places the horns of a full-grown stag upon his head where she has sprinkled. She stretches out his neck, alters his ears so the tops are pointed, changes his hands to feet, his arms to legs, and covers his body with dappled hide. Then, added to that, she makes him timid. The son of Autonoë runs away, astonished, as he flees, he is so fast. Still, when he gazes in the water and sees his face and horns, he is about to say

“I feel so wretched.”

But no voice comes out! He groans. That is his voice. Tears trickle down a face that is not his. All that remains from what he was earlier is his mind. What is he to do? Should he go back home to the royal palace? Or hide himself here in the woods? Shame hinders him from one, fear from the other.

While he is in doubt, his dogs see him. First of all, Melampus and keen Ichnobates give a signal by howling (Ichnobates comes from Crete, Melampus from a Spartan breed) and then all the other hounds run up, more swiftly than racing winds—Pamphagos, Dorceus, and Oribasus, all from Arcadia, brave Nebrophonos and savage Theron, with Laelaps and swift-footed Pterelas, keen-nosed Agre, ferocious Hylaeus, recently wounded by a boar, Nape, born from a wolf, Poemenis, trained to work with cattle, Harpyia, with her two pups, slender-flanked Sicyonian Ladon, Dromas, Canace, Sticte, Tigris, and Alce, white-haired Leucon and black Asbolus, strong-bodied Lacon and fast Aëllio, Thouës, swift Lycisca and her brother

1 Autonoë, mother of Actaeon, is one of Cadmus’s daughters.
Cyprian Harpalus, his black forehead marked with a white spot in the middle, Melaneus, Lachne with a shaggy hide, and two born from a Dictaean father and a Spartan mother—Agriodos and Labros—and shrill-barking Hylactor (there were others, too, but the total list would be too tedious). The pack of hounds is driven by its eagerness for prey over remote cliffs, rocks, and pinnacles, where the going is rough, without a path. Actaeon flees through places where often he pursued before. Now, alas, he runs from his own helpers! He longs to cry out:

“I am Actaeon. Know your own master!”

But he has no words to express that wish. The barking echoes in the upper sky. Melanchaetes is the first to wound him along the back, and then Theridamas. Oresitrophus bites into his shoulder. These dogs had gone out later but had found a quicker route by shortcuts through the hills. They keep their master pinned, as the whole pack rushes in a mass and buries its teeth in Actaeon’s flesh. By this point no place on his body remains without a wound. He groans, making sounds which are not human, but yet not ones a stag could make, and fills the well-known hills with dismal cries. His knees are bent, just like a begging suppliant, and he moves his silent features here and there, as he might move his arms.

His companions, quite ignorant of who he is, urge on the ferocious pack with their usual cries, while their eyes are searching for Actaeon. They keep calling eagerly, as if he were not there (he turns his head when he hears the name). They criticize him for not being present, for being too tired to enjoy the spectacle of their prey. He might well prefer he could be absent, but he is there. And he might well desire to see and yet not feel the savage acts of his own dogs. They stand all around him, sinking jaws inside his body, ripping to pieces their own master, whom they see as the deceiving image of a stag. Men say quiver-bearing Diana’s rage was not appeased until Actaeon’s life, after countless wounds, finally was gone.

---

1Most of the names of these dogs come from Greek words associated with characteristics of hunting dogs: “deer killer,” “hunter,” “tracker,” “howler,” and so on.

This event is viewed in different ways. To some, the goddess seems more violent than just. Others praise her for holding to her strict virginity. Each point of view comes up with its own reasons. Only Juno, Jupiter’s wife, says not a word about it, whether she approves or blames the action, but she rejoices that this calamity has fallen on Agenor’s family, for she has transferred the hatred in her heart from that Tyrian rival to her relatives.\(^1\) And now, following that earlier cause, she has another reason for her loathing. She is enraged that Semele is pregnant from the seed of powerful Jupiter.\(^2\) She loosens her tongue to abuse the girl and cries:

“All those numerous complaints of mine—what good have they done me? I must attack that girl in person. I have to kill her, if I am rightly called most mighty Juno, if it is fitting that in my right hand

---

\(^1\)The Tyrian rival is Europa, daughter of Agenor and sister of Cadmus. For the origin of Juno’s hatred of Europa, see the story of the seduction and abduction of Europa (1.865 ff).

\(^2\)Semele is a daughter of Cadmus, thus part of the same family as Europa and Actaeon.
I hold the jewelled sceptre and am queen, Jupiter’s wife and sister—well, at least his sister. But, I suppose, if the girl is happy with a secret love, the harm done to my marriage bed is trivial.
Still, she has conceived—that’s all we needed—carries clear proof of her disgraceful act in her full womb, and wishes to become the mother of a child from Jupiter, something difficult for me to manage.
She has such great faith in her own beauty,
I’ll make sure that confidence deceives her.
I am not Saturn’s daughter if that girl does not fall into waters of the Styx, dumped down in them by Jupiter himself.”

Having said this, she rises from her throne and, hidden in tawny clouds, makes her way to Semele’s door. She does not disperse the clouds until she has disguised herself as an old woman, seeding her temples with white hair, ploughing wrinkles in her skin, keeping her limbs bent, her steps unsteady.
She makes her voice like an old woman’s, too.
In fact, she now resembles Semele’s nurse, Beroë, from Epidaurus.¹ And so,
when they have a chance to talk together and have been chatting for a while, the name Jupiter comes up. Juno sighs and says:

“I really hope Jupiter is the one,
but I have my doubts about all such things.
Several men, using the names of gods,
have entered virtuous women’s bedrooms.
It’s not enough he says he’s Jupiter, if indeed that is the truth. Let him give some token of his love. You must ask him to embrace you with the style and power with which he is welcomed by great Juno, and before he does that, he should put on the symbols of his full magnificence.”

¹Epidaurus is a city in the Peloponnese.
Saying words like these, Juno goes to work on Cadmus’s unsuspecting daughter. When the girl asks Jupiter for a gift, without saying what it is, he tells her:

“Choose something. I shall refuse you nothing. To help you have more faith in what I say, let the god of the Stygian torrents stand as witness, who makes the gods afraid, the god of all the gods.”

Pleased by what was to be her doom, prevailing too easily, and about to die because her lover desires to please her, Semele replies:

“Present yourself to me in the same form in which Saturn’s daughter is accustomed to embrace you, when you are entering sexual union, the act of Venus.”

As she was speaking, Jupiter wanted to close her mouth, but her voice already had moved into the air. He gave a groan, for she could not take back what she had wished, and he could not take back what he had sworn. And so, with utmost sorrow, he rose up to lofty heaven and, with a nod, gathered the clouds that followed him, then added rains, lightning mixed in with stormy winds, thunder, and the inevitable lightning bolt. Still, he tries to minimize his power, as much as he is able, and refuses to arm himself with the fire he once used to bring down hundred-handed Typhoëus—there was too much destructiveness in that.¹ There is another less forceful lightning, to which the right hands of the Cyclopes attach less flame, less savagery and rage.² Gods call these his second-order weapons.

¹Typhoëus is a monster who fought against Jupiter. He was overthrown and buried deep in the earth, traditionally under Mount Etna, a volcano in Sicily. For further details about Typhoëus, see below 5.510 ff.
²The Cyclopes, one-eyed monsters, work in Vulcan’s forge and make Jupiter’s lightning bolts.
Jupiter takes some of them and enters Agenor’s home. But the mortal body of Semele cannot withstand the blast which comes from heaven, and she is consumed by her fiery marriage gift. The baby, not yet completely formed, is then torn out from his mother’s womb and, still premature, is sewn up (if such things can be believed) in his father’s thigh and completes the term he would have spent inside his mother’s belly. While in the cradle, his maternal aunt, Ino, raises him in secret. After that, he is given to the nymphs of Nysa who hide him in their caves and feed him milk.¹

While these events are happening on earth through laws of Fate and the crib of Bacchus, twice born, remains secure, the story goes that Jupiter, who happened to be full of nectar, shelved his serious concerns and shared some slight, amusing anecdotes at ease with Juno. Jupiter remarked:

“To tell the truth, the pleasure women get from sex is greater than what men receive.”

Juno denied the claim. They both agreed to ask wise Teiresias his opinion, since he had known both male and female love. Once in the green forest he had used his staff to strike two massive copulating snakes, and (amazingly!) he was then transformed from man to woman. He spent seven years like that, and in the eighth year came across the selfsame sight once more. And so he said:

“If the power in the stroke which hits you is so immense it can change the gender of the person who delivers the blow into its opposite, then I will now strike at you once more.”

¹The child of Semele and Zeus is Bacchus. Ino is a daughter of Cadmus and thus Semele’s sister. Nysa is a mountain far to the east. The baby was hidden to prevent Juno from harming him.
When he hit those snakes, his previous form returned, and once again he was a man. And so he is the one they choose to resolve their playful quarrel, and he confirms what Jupiter has said. Juno, they say, was seriously displeased, unjustly so, out of all proportion to the dispute. So she condemned the eyes of the one who had pronounced the judgment to eternal darkness. But Jupiter, the almighty Father, to mitigate his loss of sight (since no god is allowed to reverse the actions of another god), gave Teiresias the power to see into the future and with this honour eased his punishment.

Throughout Aonia Teiresias’s fame was highly praised in every city. When people asked him, he provided accurate replies. Dark Liriope was the first to test and to confirm the truth of what he said.1 The winding river Cephisus had once embraced her, enclosed her in his waters, and taken her by force. From her full womb this loveliest of nymphs had given birth to an infant one could fall in love with, even at that age. She called him Narcissus. When Teiresias was asked about him—whether the child was destined to pass through the distant season of mature old age—the visionary prophet then replied:

“All if he never gazes at himself.”

For some time the prophet’s words seemed worthless. But what in fact took place—the way the young lad died and the bizarre nature of his madness—proved those words were true.

1Aonia is a mountainous region of Boeotia. Liriope is the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys.
The son of Cephisus was now sixteen—one might consider him both boy and youth. Many young men and girls desired him, but in his tender frame there was such fearful pride that no young men or girls affected him.

The nymph Echo, with the resounding voice, who has not learned to hold her tongue when someone speaks or else to speak out first herself, saw Narcissus driving panicked stags towards his hunting nets. Back then Echo was not just a voice. She still had a body. But nonetheless, though she loved to talk, she could only speak as she does now. If a person uttered many words, she could repeat the last ones.

Juno had made her talk this way, because, when she could have caught out those mountain nymphs lying beside her husband Jupiter, Echo would deliberately detain her with a long chat, until the nymphs had fled.

After the goddess realized the trick, she said:

“That tongue of yours has swindled me. I will give you less power over it, the very briefest use of your own voice.”

And she made good her threat by what she did. Echo just repeats the last words spoken, merely duplicating what she has heard. So when she sees Narcissus wandering through solitary fields and burns with love, she tracks him surreptitiously. The more she follows him, the more she is on fire, just as quick-burning sulphur smeared around the tops of torches seizes any flames which approach too close. O how many times she longed to meet him with flirtatious words, using soft entreaties! Nature stops her and does not allow her to begin. But she is ready for what Nature does permit. She waits for sounds which her voice can repeat.
BOOK THREE

Now, it so happens that the boy, enticed away from a group of faithful comrades, shouts out:

   “Is there anybody here?”

Echo answers:

   “Here!”

He is astonished. He casts his eye in all directions and, in a loud voice, cries:

   “Come over here!”

She calls back to the person calling her. He looks around and, when no one comes out, he shouts again:

   “Why run away from me?”

He gets back all the words he has called out. Narcissus stands there, misled by what seems a voice which answers his, and calls again:

   “Let’s meet here together.”

She could not reply more willingly to any sound, and cried:

   “Meet here together.”

To support her words, she came out from the woods and ran to him, to throw her arms around the neck she loved. He ran away and, as he ran, complained:

   “Take your hands off me! Stop these embraces! I’ll die before you have your way with me!”

All she replied was:

   “Have your way with me.”
Now spurned, she conceals herself in forests, and, in her shame, covers her face with leaves. ECHO IS TRANSFORMED
From that time on, she lives in lonely caves. But still her love is there and even grows from the pain of her rejection. Worries and lack of sleep waste her wretched body. Poverty shrinks her skin, and all juices in her body move out into the air. Only her voice and bones are left. Her voice still lives. The story goes her bones were changed to shapes of stone. Since that time, she hides out in the woods. No one has ever seen her in the mountains, but she is heard by all. It is the sound which still lives on in her.

Narcissus scorned her, just as he had scorned other nymphs born in the streams and mountains, just as he had previously scorned whole companies of men. Then one of those Narcissus had rejected raised his hands up to the sky and prayed:

“Though he may love another in this way, let him not have what he desires from love.”

The prayer was just, and goddess Nemesis agreed to it.¹

There was a clear stream, with limpid waters like silver, as yet untouched by shepherds or goats and cattle grazing mountain slopes, undisturbed by any bird, savage beast, or bough split off a tree. All around it there was grass fed by adjacent waters and trees which would not let the pool grow warm from any sun. Here Narcissus, weary from eager hunting and the heat, lay down, attracted by the scenery of the place and by the water springs. And while he tries to slake his thirst, another thirst begins.

¹Ovid calls the goddess of Retribution Rhamnasia, an alternative name for Nemesis, daughter of Jupiter, who had a temple at Rhamnus, in Athens.
As he is drinking, he sees an image,
the reflection of his face, and falls in love, desiring a thing which has no substance.
He thinks the shadow must possess a body.
Astonished by himself, he remains there, motionless, wearing the same expression,
like a statue made of Parian marble.
Stretched out along the ground, he contemplates the double constellation of his eyes, his hair, which looks suitable for Bacchus or worthy of Apollo, his beardless cheeks, his ivory neck, his sensuous mouth,
and the blush mixed in with snowy whiteness, adoring every feature which makes him worth admiring. Without a sense of shame, he desires himself. The one approving is the person being approved, and while he is pursuing, he is being pursued.
He kindles fire and burns at the same time.
How often he kisses the devious spring without success! How often he reaches in to clutch the neck he sees in the centre of the water, and yet his arms cannot embrace himself! What he is looking at he does not recognize, but what he sees sets him aflame, and the very error which deceives his eyes excites them. Why then, you foolish lad, do you keep trying to clutch that fleeting image? What you are seeking does not exist. And if you turn away, you will lose the thing you love. What you see is the shadow of a mirror image, which has nothing of its own. It arrives with you and stays with you and leaves with you, if you can leave. No need for Ceres’ food, no need for rest can take him from the place.
Instead he lies on the thick grass and peers
at the misleading image, for his eyes can never gaze enough. He lifts himself a little, holds out his arms, and cries:

“You forest trees, has anyone ever been more cruelly in love? You should know, for you have offered useful hiding places to many lovers. In all those ages your life has passed, that huge expanse of time, have you known anyone who pined away like this? I see him, and he pleases me.
But still, what I see and what pleases me
I cannot find. My loving has been caught in such a huge mistake! To make my grief more painful still, we are not held apart
by the mighty sea or by some journey, or by mountains, or walls with bolted gates.
The only thing which keeps us separate is that tiny pool! He himself desires to be embraced. Every time I lean down with my lips to the clear water, he lifts his upturned face to mine. And you would think he could be touched. It's such a little thing that blocks our love. Whoever you may be, come here! O you extraordinary boy, why play these tricks with me? When I seek you, where do you go? You cannot be running from my shape and youth, and I am someone who has been loved by nymphs! You promise me, with that loving face of yours, unknown hope.
When I hold out my arms to you, then you are happy to hold out your own. When I smile, you smile. Often I have seen you weeping when I shed tears. And if I nod my head, you return my gesture. From the motion of your fair mouth I guess you send back words which do not reach my ears. I am in you.
I have felt it. I am not being deceived by my own image. I am burning up with love for my own self. I rouse the flames and suffer from them, too. What do I do?
Should I be the person asking or being asked?
But what is there to ask for? What I want is with me. My riches have made me poor.
O how I wish I could divide myself from my own body! What a novel wish for someone who's in love, for I desire to be divided from the one I love.
Now sorrow saps my strength. My time of life will soon run out, and I will pass away in the prime of youth. And for me my death will not be a burden, since, by dying, I put my pain to rest. I would prefer the one I love to keep on living longer, but now the two of us, both in one life,
will die together.”

Narcissus finished.
Not thinking clearly, he went back again to the same image and splashed the waters with his tears. Once he disturbed the surface, the reflection was obscured. When he saw the image disappearing, he cried out:

“Where are you going? Stay! Do not leave me, you pitiless boy, the one who loves you!
Let me gaze upon the face I cannot touch,
the food I need to feed my wretched madness.”

In his grief, he ripped the upper border of his clothing and beat his naked chest with hands as white as marble. As he struck, his chest turned rosy red, just like apples,
in which some parts are usually red and some are white, or just as unripe grapes in various bunches commonly possess a purple colour. Once he saw his image in the water, he could not endure it a moment longer, but, as yellow wax drips in a tiny flame, as morning frost dissolves in the warm sun, so Narcissus, wasted by love, gradually melts away, consumed by hidden fire. And now his face has no more colour red mixed in with white.
He lacks vitality and strength, those things which, only recently, gave such delight to the body Echo earlier had loved.
She was still angry and remembered him,
but when she saw Narcissus, she was sad.
Whenever the poor boy would cry:

“Alas!”
her echoing voice would then repeat:

“Alas!”
And when he struck his shoulders with his hands, she sent him back the same sound as the blow. His final words as he was looking in those waters he habitually watched were these:

“Alas, my beloved boy, in vain!”

The place gave every word back in reply. He cried:

“Farewell.”

And Echo called:

“Farewell!”

He set his weary head down on green turf, and death closed up those eyes which so admired the beauty of their master. Even then, after he had been received in houses of the dead, he would keep gazing into waters of the Styx. His naiad sisters wept for Narcissus. They cut off their hair and laid it out for him. The dryads, too, lamented, and Echo returned their cries. Now they were preparing the funeral pyre, the torches they would brandish, and the bier. But there was no body. Instead they found a flower with a central yellow part surrounded by white petals on all sides.

When cities in Achaea heard of this, talk about it made Teiresias famous, and rightly so. His reputation soared. Of all the people, there was only one—Pentheus, son of Echion, a man contemptuous of the gods—who scorned him, ridiculing the old man’s prophecies and mocking his darkness, his loss of sight (for Juno had removed his power to see).1

1Pentheus is the son of Agave, a daughter of Cadmus, and thus part of the royal family of Thebes. For details about Teiresias’s loss of sight, see 3.511 above.
Shaking his temples covered with white hair, Teiresias said:

“How happy you would be if you, too, were deprived of light, so then you could not witness Bacchus’ sacred rites! For the day is coming—and I predict it is not far away—when the new god, Bacchus, son of Semele, will be here. If you do not think of him as worthy of worship in the temples, you will be torn up, scattered in a thousand places, and will pollute the forests, your mother, and her sisters with your blood. So be it! For you will not believe this deity merits those honours. Then you will complain that in this darkness I have seen too much.”

As Teiresias is muttering these things, Pentheus dismisses him. But his words prove true. What the prophet has predicted comes to pass.

Bacchus appears. Fields resound with festive shouting, crowds rush about—men, married women, common folk, and leaders, all mixed up, carried off to unknown rites. Pentheus shouts:

“Children of the dragon, you warlike people, what is this madness which has seized your minds? Can the clash of brass against brass, curved-horn pipes, and magic tricks have such a powerful effect, that sounds of women’s screams and the insanity stirred by wine, obscene mobs, and senseless drums conquer people who were not terrified of warlike swords, or trumpets, or columns of drawn steel? You old men, should I be proud that you, who were borne far across the sea and in this very region set up Tyre

---

1The Thebans are those who came from Tyre with Cadmus as well as the descendents of those who appeared out of the earth when Cadmus sowed the dragon’s teeth (3.153 ff.).
and your once banished household gods, are now letting them be taken without a fight? You young men, whose age is more vigorous, closer to my own, you are better suited to bear weapons than to hold a thyrsus, and to have helmets covering your heads rather than a bunch of leaves.\footnote{The Bacchic rites involved ecstatic worship out in the countryside, with plenty of drinking and group dancing. The thyrsus is a plant stalk, an important symbol in the ritual.} I beg you to recall the race of those you come from, and take on the spirit of that dragon. He was just one, but he slaughtered many. He died for his spring and pool, and you men, you should be winning glorious triumphs! He put brave men to death. You should drive out these degenerates and guard the honour of your ancestors. If Fates have decreed Thebes will not long survive, then how I wish siege engines and warriors would demolish the city walls with crashing fire and steel!\footnote{Bacchus, the new god, claims that he is the son of Jupiter.} We would be sad, but there would be no guilt. Our fate would be something we could lament, not something we should hide, and our weeping would be free from shame. But now Thebes will fall to an unarmed boy, who does not delight in war, or weapons, or using horses, but likes hair doused with myrrh, tender garlands, purple garments, and gold embroidery. But if you stand aside, I will force him quickly to acknowledge that his father is a pretense and his rites are fictions.\footnote{Acrisius was king of Argos. He refused to allow the new god Bacchus or his rites in the city. His story is told in Book 4.} If Acrisius has sufficient courage to slur a worthless deity and shut the gates of Argos to stop him entering, should Pentheus, along with all of Thebes, be conquered by some foreign charlatan?"
“Leave quickly. Go and drag him here in chains, this so-called leader. And with these commands there must be no slackness, no malingering!”

His grandfather, his uncle Athamas, and all the others in his crowds of friends tell Pentheus he is wrong, and they try, without success, to hold him back. Warnings increase the fierceness of his rage, which chafes and grows when it is checked. And the delays just make things worse. I have seen streams like that. When no obstruction blocks the water’s flow, it runs down easily, without much noise, but wherever logs and stones are in the way, holding back the stream, it grows turbulent and races from the barrier enraged.

The king’s attendants soon return, covered with blood. Pentheus asks where Bacchus is. The servants say they have not seen him, adding:

“But we captured one of his companions, someone who helps him in the sacred rites.”

They show the king a prisoner, with his hands tied behind his back, a stranger who has come from Tyrrhenian people and follows the rituals of Bacchus. Pentheus, whose rage has made his eyes look horrible, looks at the man and, though he finds it hard to delay the time of punishment, says:

“You who are about to die and whose death will provide a warning to the others, tell us your name, the country you come from, who your parents are, and why you carry on these newly fashionable rituals.”

The stranger, with no sign of fear, replies:

“My name is Acoetes, my country Maeonia, and, as for my parents,

---

1Athamas is married to Ino, sister of Agave, Pentheus’s mother. Pentheus’s grandfather is Cadmus.
they were humble common folk.' My father left no fields to till with hardy oxen, no flocks or sheep, or any cattle herds. He himself was poor. It was his custom to hunt for leaping fish with line and hook, using his rod to bring them in. That skill was all his wealth. When he passed it to me, he said:

‘Accept the riches I possess.
You are my heir, successor to my work.’

So when he died, he left nothing to me but the streams, the only things I can call my patrimony. Later, to avoid being always stuck on the same rocks, I learned to steer a ship, handling the rudder in my right hand and keeping my eyes fixed on rainy stars of the Olenian goat, as well as Taygete and Hyades, the Bear, the houses of the winds, and harbours suitable for ships.² Well, it so happened while on my way to Delos, I was blown onto coastal lands of Chios. With oars we deftly brought the ship up to the shore. I leapt out quickly, landing on wet sand. We spent the night there. And when Aurora first began to redden, then I get up and tell the men to bring fresh water on, pointing out a pathway leading to a stream. I myself from a high hill look around to see what the wind is promising me. After that I call to my companions and go back to the ship. My chief comrade, Opheltes, shouts out:

‘See, all of us are here.’

¹Maenonia is a region in the Near East (part of modern Turkey).
²These names refer to figures set among the constellations. The Olenian she goat suckled infant Jupiter (as a constellation it was associated with rainstorms). Taygete was one of the daughters of Atlas, set in the Pleiades. The Hyades were the nurses of Bacchus. They had been changed into constellations.
And he leads up across the shore a boy with all the beauty of a virgin girl.
He found him in an isolated field and considers him a prize. The young lad, heavy with wine and sleep, seems to stagger and has trouble keeping up. I observe his clothing, his appearance, and his gait.
I see nothing in him which could make me think he is a mortal being. Sensing this,
I say to my companions:

‘I’m not sure
just what deity is in that body, but inside that young boy there is a god. Whoever you may be, be kind to us, assist our efforts, and forgive these men.’

Dictys, the fastest man at climbing up the top part of the sails, grabbing a rope, and sliding down again, speaks up:

‘Stop praying
on our behalf.’

Libys agrees with him,
as do blond Melanthus, our bow lookout, Alcimeden, and Epopeus, too,
who shouted out the stroke-beat for the oars,
called for a rest, and kept their spirits up.
The others all agree with him, so blind is their desire for plunder. I cry out:

‘But I will not let a sacrilegious act violate this ship. And in this matter by rights the greatest share belongs to me.’

I block their way. The boldest of them all, Lycabas, is enraged. He’d been banished from a town in Tuscany, punished with exile for an appalling murder.
While I hold him, he hits me in the throat with his young fist and would have thrown me in the sea, if I had not, though shaken, been held up by a rope. That ruffian crew applauds his action. And then, finally, Bacchus (for it is Bacchus), as if the noise has dispelled his torpor and his senses are returning from the wine inside his heart, speaks up:

’What are you doing? What’s this din? You sailors, tell me how I reached this place? And where do you propose to carry me?’

Proreus then replied:

’Don’t be afraid. Tell us the harbours you would like to reach. We’ll take you to the land you’re looking for.’

Bacchus said:

‘Then set your course for Naxos. That is my home. The land will welcome you.’

The treacherous men swear by all the gods and by the sea that that’s what they will do and bid me hoist sail on our painted ship. Naxos was on the right. As I spread out the right-hand sails, each one of them in turn asks me:

’What are you up to, you idiot? What madness grips you now, Acoetes? Steer to the left-hand side.’

Most of the men show me what they mean by nodding, and some whisper in my ear what they are after. I was horrified and said:

’Someone else should take the tiller.’

And I moved away, not taking any part in what they did or in their crime. Each one of them shouts out at me. The entire crew is muttering.
One man—Aethalion—says:

‘It’s not as if
our entire safety rests on you alone.’

He shifts himself across to my position, takes on my work, sets a different course,
and sails away from Naxos. Then the god, in a mock way, as if only now
he has at last realized their deceit, looks out on the sea from the curving stern and, like a man in tears, cries out:

‘You sailors,
these shores are not the ones you promised me,
not the lands I asked for! What have I done to deserve such punishment? What glory do you win for yourselves if you mislead a boy, if many men deceive just one?’

I had been weeping for some time. The crew, those profane men, just ridicule my tears and with oars rowing at a rapid rate keep striking at the sea. Now I swear to you by the god himself (and there is no god more powerful than he) that the events which I describe are every bit as true as they defy belief. Our ship stops there, in the open sea, just as if it sat in dry dock. The sailors, astonished, keep pulling on their oars. They unfurl the sails and try in these two ways to move ahead.
But ivy locks the oars and, creeping up in winding tendrils, hangs in heavy bunches from the sail. The god himself, his forehead wrapped in a wreath of clustered grapes, holds up a spear decked out with ivy leaves. Round him lie phantom visions of tigers, lynxes, and threatening shapes of spotted panthers.
The men, afraid or mad, jump overboard.
Medon is the first whose entire body turns black and whose spine begin to twist in a curving arc. Then Lycabas yells:

THE CREW IS TRANSFORMED
'What sort of monster are you turning into?'

As he said these words, his jaws expanded, his nostrils bent, his skin grew hard and scaly. Then Libys, who was still trying to get the seized-up oars to move, suddenly saw his hands were shrinking. Then he had no hands! They both had changed to fins. Another man tried to stretch his arms to the twisted ropes, but he had no arms, and, arching backwards, his limbless body tumbled in the sea. He had a tail, a curving hook, like horns on a partial moon. Dolphins jump around in all directions, dripping lots of spray. They jump again and then dive down once more deep beneath the waves, in a playful group. They look just like a company of dancers, throwing their wanton bodies here and there, and spouting water they have taken in through open nostrils. Of the twenty men some moments earlier (that was the crew we carried on the ship) I alone remained. I was afraid and cold, my body shook, with almost no control. The god spoke up to reassure me:

‘Free your heart from fear, and make for Naxos.’

So I was taken to his island home, and at altar fires I supervise the sacred rites of Bacchus.”

Pentheus replied:

“We have lent our ears to this long story, so that this delay might mitigate the power of our rage. You attendants, take this fellow away, and quickly, too. Tear his body apart with dreadful tortures, and then send it down to Stygian darkness.”
So Acoetes, the Tyrrhenian, is at once dragged off and imprisoned in a solid building. But while, as ordered, they are preparing fire and iron, the vicious tools of death, doors of the prison, so the story goes, spontaneously open, and the chains, on their own, with no one loosening them, fall off. Echion’s son remains unchanged. But now he does not tell his men to march to Mount Cithaeron—he goes in person, right to the place they’ve chosen to enact the sacred ritual. The mountain echoes to the loud songs and shouts of worshippers celebrating Bacchus. Just as a keen horse neighs when the warlike trumpeter sends out his signal with resounding brass and shows his love of war, so Pentheus is stirred by a heaven pierced with drawn-out chanting. As he listened, his anger blazed once more.

Almost in the middle of that mountain there is a forest, whose edges enclose a treeless field, open on every side. Here Pentheus’s mother was the first to see him watching, with his profane eyes, the sacred rites. She was the very first roused to rush insanely at him, the first to hurl her thyrsus stem against her son and wound him. She cried out:

“Come here, sisters, both of you! There’s a huge boar wandering in our fields! I must kill that boar!”

The crowd, one common frenzy, all massed together and charged, attacking frightened Pentheus, already terrified and speaking words far less violent, already shouting he was in the wrong and pleading guilty to a crime. Though wounded, he kept screaming: “Bring help, Autonoë. You are my aunt.
Let Actaeon’s spirit move your heart!”

But she has no sense at all who Actaeon might be.¹
As he is pleading with her, she rips off his right arm. Ino, in a frenzy, pulls out the other one. The poor man has no arms to hold out to his mother. He shows her his mutilated body, with its limbs torn out, and cries:

“Mother! Look at me!”

Agave looks at him and howls. She turns her neck, letting her hair toss in the breeze, then seizes his head in bloodstained fingers,
ears it off, and shouts:

“Friends, look over here!
This conquest is our work!”

From a high tree
winds do not rip leaves touched by autumn’s cold and still clinging on precariously faster than Pentheus’s limbs were stripped by their abominable hands. And so, warned by such examples, Theban women
take part in the new rites, offer incense, and worship at Bacchus’ sacred altars.

¹Autonoë, sister of Agave, is the mother of Actaeon, whose story is told earlier in this book (3.217 ff).
BOOK IV

[The daughters of Minyas scorn Bacchus; the first daughter tells the story of Pyrasus and Thisbe; the second tells the story of Venus and Mars being trapped by Vulcan while having sex, and then the story of Helios and Leucothoë: how Leucothoë is transformed into a plant and Clytë into a heliotrope; the third sister, Alcithoë, tells the story of Salmacis and Hermaphroditus; the daughters of Minyas turn into bats; Juno’s hatred of Ino; Juno visits the Underworld, sees Tityos, Tantalus, Sisyphus, Ixion, and the Danaïds being punished; she enlists the help of Tisiphone; Tisiphone poisons Athamas and Ino, who go mad and kill their children; Ino and her child become sea gods; Juno changes Ino’s companions to stone; Cadmus and Harmonia go into exile and become snakes; Perseus visits Atlas; Medusa’s head turns Atlas to stone; Perseus rescues Andromeda; Medusa’s head hardens seaweed to stone; Perseus and the daughters of Phorcys; Perseus describes the birth of Pegasus and the origin of Medusa’s snake-filled hair.]

But Alcithoë, daughter of Minyas, does not believe those divine rituals should be accepted. Even now the girl is rash enough to deny that Bacchus is a child of Jupiter, and she has sisters who share in her impiety. The priest had ordered a celebration of the festival. He told mistresses and maids who had been excused from duties to cover their breasts with animal skins, undo the ribbons in their hair, and grip a leafy thyrsus in their hands. The god, he prophesied, would be cruelly angry, if they offended him. Older women and young wives obeyed him, setting aside looms and baskets and tasks not yet complete. They offered incense and called on Bacchus, Bromius, Lyaeus, the Fire-Born One, the Twice Born, the only being who possessed two mothers. They added God of Nysa, unshorn Thyoneus, with Lenaeus planter of the joyous grape, Nyctelius, father Eleleus, Iacchus, Evan,

THE DAUGHTERS OF MINYAS

1Minyas was a ruler of the Boeotians. The rituals in question are those of Bacchus.
2These names and titles are alternatives for the name Bacchus. He is called “fire born” because his mother was destroyed by a lightning bolt from Jupiter, who then removed the infant from her womb. Bacchus is twice born because he was delivered prematurely from his mother, Semele, and came to term sewn up in Jupiter’s thigh. For the same reason he has “two mothers.” See Ovid’s version of the story in Book 3 above.
and the many others names they call you, Bacchus, throughout all Greece. For your youth ever ends—you are an eternal boy, looked upon as the most beautiful one in lofty heaven. When you are standing without your horns, you have a virgin’s look.
The conquered orient belongs to you,
as far as where dark India is washed by the distant river Ganges. And you, venerated god, struck down Pentheus and Lycurgus armed with his two-edged axe, both blasphemous men, and hurled the bodies of those Tyrrenians into the sea.¹
You harness the proud necks of two lynxes with coloured reins. Bacchantes and satyrs all follow you, as does that drunk old man, Silenus, who holds up his shaking limbs with a staff and hangs on unsteadily to his sway-backed mule.² Wherever you go,
shouts of young men rise, with women’s voices,
drums struck by hand, brass cymbals, and long pipes.
Ismenian women call upon the god,

“Be present here—peaceful and kind to us.”³

And they celebrate the stipulated rites.
But Minyas’s daughters stay indoors,
the only ones to disturb the festival with inappropriate activities, Minerva’s work—spinning wool, twisting strands by hand, remaining seated at their looms and keeping their servants busy at their work.
One of those sisters, as her slender thumb is drawing thread, speaks up:

“While other girls
refuse to keep on working and celebrate

¹Lycurgus was a king of Thrace who opposed the worship of Bacchus. Pentheus did the same in Thebes. For the stories of Pentheus and of the Tyrrenians, see Book 3 above.
²Bacchantes were the followers of Bacchus. Satyrs in Greek mythology were male companions of Dionysus (Bacchus), associated with wine, pipes, and sexual pleasure in the woods. Silenus was one of the main companions of Bacchus and his tutor. His name is not given in the Latin text, but the description seems clearly to indicate who is being referred to.
³The word Ismenian, from the name of a river, is another name for Theban.
these so-called sacred rituals, those of us who serve Pallas, a finer deity, should make these useful tasks much easier by talking of different things, taking turns to tell a story to entertain us all and fill our idle ears, so that the time will pass more quickly.”

Her sisters agree with the suggestion and tell her to start with the first story. She wonders which tale she should select out of so rich a store (for she does know an enormous number) and is not sure whether she should tell them how you, Babylonian Dercetis, can live (so those in Palestine believe) in an altered form in water, with scales covering your limbs, or how your daughter acquired wings and in her early years lived in dove-cotes painted white, or how a naiad through her song and herbs with too much power changed young men's bodies into silent fish, until she suffered the same thing, or else how the tree which used to bear white berries, once it was soaked with blood, now bears dark fruit.1 This last one pleases her, since the story is not well known. So as she spins her wool to thread, she begins the tale, as follows:

“In the place where they say Semiramis surrounded her high city with brick walls, Pyramus and Thisbe lived in houses side by side—the finest looking young lad and the choicest girl in the entire East.2 As neighbours, they got to know each other and took their first few steps together. In time, love grew, and they would have been united, swearing the marriage oath, but their parents would not permit it. Still, the two of them

---

1Dercetis was a Near Eastern goddess, supposedly half fish. Her daughter Semiramis, a legendary Eastern queen, very early in her life lived among doves. The name of the first sister to tell a story is Arsippe. Ovid does not mention her name here.

2The city in the story is Babylon.
burned with love, minds equally committed, a fiery blaze their parents could not quench. No one knows about it. They speak with nods and signs. The more they try to hide the fire, the hotter it burns. Their two houses shared a wall in common, which had been fractured, leaving a narrow crack. This had happened earlier when it was built, and no one, in all the many years, had seen the fault. But what does love not notice? You lovers were the first to find it, and you made it a pathway for your voices. Through that crack the slightest murmurs of your tender words would safely pass. When they stood beside it, Thisbe on one side, Pyramus the other, and each one of them, in turn, had seized on breath from the other’s mouth, they often said:

‘Envious wall, why be an obstacle to lovers? Would it be so difficult to let us completely join our bodies? Or if that is too much, you might at least open up so we can kiss each other. We are not ungrateful, for we admit it is thanks to you we have a passage for words to reach our loving ears.’

They spoke like this in vain, from both sides of the wall. Night came. They said farewell, and each one gave his own side kisses, which did not pass through and reach the other side.

One morning later, when Dawn had sent away the stars of night and sunlight had dried out the frosty grass, they met at their accustomed place. First of all, they complained about their many troubles, talking there in quiet murmurs. But then, they decided they would try outwitting their guardians in the silence of the night, go outside, and, once they had left the house, they would also leave the built-up city. So they would not lose their way wandering across open fields, they agreed to meet at the tomb of Ninus and hide themselves in the shadows of a tree. In that place stood a lofty mulberry loaded down with white fruit, beside an ice-cold fountain.

They thought the plan a good one. When daylight, which seems to leave so slowly, is cast down in the waters and from those same waters night emerges, Thisbe opens the door and steals out through the darkness, deceiving her own family. Her face veiled, she reaches the tomb and sits down by the very tree they talked about. Love makes her bold. But then, lo and behold, a lioness comes there, with foaming jaws smeared from a recent kill of oxen, intending to slake her thirst in the waters of the near-by fountain.

Babylonian Thisbe sees the creature from a distance in the moonlight and runs, with trembling steps, into a murky cave.

In her rush, the veil falls off behind her and remains there. Once the fierce lioness has drunk her fill, quenched her thirst, and moved towards the trees, by chance she finds the veil (without the girl) and rips the silky fabric in her bloodstained jaws. Pyramus goes out somewhat later and in the deep dust sees clear footprints of the savage animal.

His whole face turns pale. When he also sees the garment stained with blood, he cries:

‘One night will see two lovers perish. Of the two she was the one who most deserved to live a lengthy life. My soul has done great harm. I have been your death, you unhappy girl, the one who told you to come out at night to places full of danger and was not the first to get here. O you fierce lions, wherever you may live beneath this rock, tear apart my body, and with sharp teeth devour my wicked heart. But that’s the way a coward acts—to hope that death will come.’
He picks up Thisbe’s veil, takes it with him to the shade of that tree they talked about. When he has shed his tears into the veil he knows so well and kissed it, he cries out:

‘Now soak yourself in my blood, too.’

Then, without a pause, he plunges the sword he carries on his belt into his belly and, as he is dying, pulls the blade out from the seething wound. He is on the ground, lying on his back, blood spraying way up high, just as a pipe made of defective lead will split and, through the hissing crack, water shoots in thin streams far away, as its spurts pulse through the air. On the mulberry tree the fruits change colour from the sprinkling blood. They now look black, and as blood soaks the roots, it stains the hanging mulberries dark purple.

Lo, Thisbe, not yet free from fear, returns, so she will not disappoint her lover. Her eyes and heart search for the youth. She yearns to tell him the great danger she escaped. She knows the place and outline of the tree, which she has seen before, but the colour of the fruit makes her unsure. She wonders if this is the tree. While still uncertain, she catches sight of quivering limbs beating on the bloodstained soil. She draws her foot back, her face as pale as boxwood, and then shudders like the sea which ripples when slight breezes brush across its surface. She hesitates, then sees her love, and, with a cry of grief, she strikes her innocent arms, tears her hair, embraces the body of the man she loves, and fills his wounds with tears, mixing their drops with her lover’s blood. She kisses his cold face and cries:

‘O Pyramus, what accident has taken you from me? O Pyramus, answer! Your dearest Thisbe calls to you. Please hear me, and raise your sagging head!’
At Thisbe’s name, Pyramus raised his eyes, already heavy with death, looked at her, and closed them once again. She saw the veil, recognized it was her own, then noticed the ivory scabbard had no sword. She cried:

‘Your own hand and your love have finished you, unhappy man. I, too, have a strong hand— enough for this one thing. And I have love, which will give me strength to endure the wounds. I shall follow you in death, and people will call me the most unfortunate cause and companion of your fate. You, alas, who could be torn from me by death alone, will not be torn away in death. And yet, you poor parents, mine and his, I ask you with words from both of us, in your great grief, do not forbid those whom true love has joined in their last hour to be laid together in a common tomb. And you, O tree, whose branches now cover the sad body of one of us and will soon cover two, keep the symbols of our deaths, and always yield dark fruit appropriate for mourning, a symbol of the blood we two have shed.’

Thisbe finished. Then setting the sword point beneath her breast, she fell upon the blade, still steaming from the blood of Pyramus. But her entreaty did affect the gods and moved her parents. So when fully ripe, the fruit is dark, and what remains of them after the funeral pyre sits in one urn.”

Her story ended. There was a brief pause. Then Leuconoë started speaking, while the other sisters all stayed silent.

“Love has even made the Sun his captive, the one who with his starry light controls all things. I’ll speak about his love affairs. First, this god, so people think, once observed adulterous acts of Mars and Venus (for this god is the first to catch a glimpse of anything). He was annoyed and told her husband, Vulcan, a son of Juno, about the blemish on his marriage bed and mentioned where the sex taken place. Vulcan’s heart fell, and his skillful right hand dropped what he was working on. Instantly he filed slender chains of brass, nets, and snares which would deceive the eye. The finest thread could not surpass his handiwork, not even spider webs hanging from the topmost beams. He made them sensitive to tiny movements, the slightest touch, and set them cunningly in place around the bed. When his wife came with the adulterer to that same bed, thanks to her husband’s skill and to the chains forged in this new fashion, they were both stuck, caught right in the middle of embracing. Vulcan, god of Lemnos, swiftly opened up the ivory doors and let in the gods. The two embarrassed lovers were ashamed. One of the gods, not the least upset, said:

‘Now, that’s the way I’d like to be disgraced!’

The gods above all laughed, and for some time this was the most famous tale in heaven.

Cytherea remembers who informed against her and inflicts a punishment, and, in her turn, wounds with similar love the one who harmed her secret love with Mars.¹

And so, son of Hyperion, what use to you now are your beauty, your colour, and your radiant light?² You who burn all lands with your own fires are surely now being burned with a new fire, and you, who should observe all things, just gaze at Leucothoë, fixing on one young girl those eyes of yours which should be looking at the entire world.

¹Cytherea is another name for Venus, derived from an island off the Peloponnese, where she first came ashore when she rose from the sea.
²Here Ovid is identifying the sun with the Greek god, the Titan Helios, son of Hyperion, rather than, as earlier (in Book 2, for example), with Apollo.
Sometimes you rise in eastern skies too soon, and sometimes fall into the ocean late. Whenever you slow down to look at her, you drag out the winter hours. And sometimes you go out. Your mind’s anxiety affects your light, and Earth, now hidden in darkness, terrifies men’s hearts. And you do not fade because the image of the moon, closer to our Earth, has blocked you. No. It is love that takes your colour. You love only her. You spend no time with Clymene, Rhodos, or with Aeae Circe’s lovely mother, or Clytië, who yearns for your embrace, though you despise her, and at this moment nurses a deep wound.¹ Leucothoë makes you forget so many, the young girl born to Eurynome, the loveliest of that perfume-making race, but later, when the girl grew up, she was even finer than her mother, as much as Eurynome was more beautiful than all the others. Her father, Orchamus, governed cities in Achaemenia, and is reckoned seventh after ancient Belus, founder of the royal line.²

The horses of the sun pasture under western skies. In those fields they have ambrosia instead of grass, which, after their daily task, nourishes their limbs and energizes them once more. And while these animals are browsing there on heavenly feed and it is Night’s turn to do her work, the god of the sun goes in his loved one’s room, after he has changed to look just like her mother, Eurynome, and in the lamplight sees Leucothoë with twelve servant women, drawing smooth threads ¹Rhodos was a daughter of Neptune. Circe’s mother was Persa, daughter of Oceanus. Aeaea is a region in Colchis. Clymene, as we see in Book 1, is the mother of Phaëton.

²Eurynome was the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. The perfume-making races are those living in regions of Arabia. Achaemenia is another name for Persia, derived from the name of one of its kings. Belus was, according to legend, the original king.
on twirling spindles. The god embraces her,
the way a mother would her well-loved daughter,
and says:

‘I need to share a secret.
Servants must leave. Do not deprive a mother of her right to say some things in private.’

They obey, and there are no witnesses inside the room. The god says:

‘I am the one 330
who measures the long year, who views all things,
and thanks to whom the earth sees anything.
I am the eye of the world. Believe this—
I find you pleasing.’

The terrified girl
trembles. The distaff and the spindle slip from her unmoving fingers. But her fear makes her more lovely, and the god can wait no longer. He returns to his true shape and customary splendor, and though the girl is frightened by the unexpected sight, she is overwhelmed by his magnificence and, setting her objections to the side, lets herself be ravished by the god.

Clytië was jealous (for there is nothing gentle about the way she loves the Sun), and, driven by anger at her rival,
she spread the story of the sexual act, saying bad things about Leucothoë and telling Orchamus, her father, a wild, ferocious man. He buried his child deep in the earth. As she stretched out her hands towards the sunlight, entreating him, she cried:

‘He took me forcefully against my will!’

But her father still kept piling over her a mound of heavy sand. Hyperion’s son dispersed this with his rays and offered her a passageway to show her buried face.
But Leucothoë could not raise her head, crushed by the weight of earth. She just lay there, a bloodless corpse. And people say the god who drives those flying horses had never seen, not since the fires which took Phaëton’s life, anything more pitiful than that sight. In fact, he tried to see if his own rays might bring back living heat to her cold limbs. But since Fate is against such bold attempts, he spread sweet-smelling nectar on her corpse and on the place and, after grieving, said:

‘In spite of this you will reach heaven still.’

Her body, drenched in heavenly nectar, immediately dissolved. Its sweet fragrance soaked the ground, and a stem of frankincense slowly pushed out its root into the soil, rose up, and with its tip broke through the mound.

Although love could excuse sad Clytie’s pain, and her pain excuse the way she gossiped, the giver of light no longer saw her—his love for her was finished. From that time, having abused her love so foolishly, she pined away. With no time for other nymphs, she sat down on bare earth by night and day under the sky, bareheaded, dishevelled, tasting no food or water for nine days, breaking her fasting only with her tears and with the dew, not moving from the ground. She gazed only on the features of the Sun, turning to face him as he moved around. They say her limbs grew roots into the earth and a lurid pallor changed her colour to a bloodless plant. But one part is red, and a flower very like a violet conceals her face. She is held down by roots, but always turns her face towards her Sun. Although transformed, she still maintains her love.”

Leuconoë ends her tale. Their ears are captivated by the strange events. Part of them denies they could have happened, and part declares that with authentic gods
call things are possible, but Bacchus, of course, is not among them.

After the sisters
quiet down, they call on Alcithoë, who, while running thread through her upright loom with her weaving shuttle, declares:

“I will not speak
of the well-known love affairs of Daphnis, that shepherd boy from Ida, whom some nymph, angry at a rival, turned into stone (the grief that burns up lovers is so strong!), nor will I tell how laws of nature changed and Sithon’s sex became ambiguous, both male and female.¹ And I’ll overlook you, too, Celmis, once a most loyal friend to infant Jupiter and now a lump of adamantine rock. Nor will I tell how Curetes were born from storms of rain, or how Crocus changed, along with Smilax, to tiny flowers. I’ll set these tales aside and charm your mind with something sweet and new.²

You will learn why the spring of Salmacis is so notorious, why its waters have such a strong, malevolent effect, weakening and softening every limb they touch. This power of theirs is famous, but the cause is hidden. Below the caves of Ida, naiad nymphs brought up a boy born to Hermes and goddess Aphrodite.
In his face one could make out his father and his mother, and from them he derived his name: he was called Hermaphroditus.³
When he is fifteen years of age, he leaves

---

¹The details of this person are unknown.
²Celmis was an infant friend of Jupiter’s. Juno changed him into stone. The Curetes were attendants on Rhea, Jupiter’s mother. Crocus and Smilax were mortal lovers changed into flowers.
³The Greek names for the parents are necessary here in order to understand the derivation of the boy’s name. Ovid calls the father Mercury and the mother the Cytherean (which does not clarify the origin of the name). At this stage Ovid does not provide the boy’s name, but it appears later in the story. Ida was a mountain near Troy.
his paternal hills, deserting Ida, where he was raised, and then takes great delight wandering around in unknown regions and seeking unfamiliar rivers. His joy makes travelling easy. He even goes to Lycian cities and nearby towns in the neighbouring lands of Caria. Here he comes across a pool of water so clear his eyes can see the bottom. It has no marshy reeds, barren sedge, or rushes with spiked tops. The water is transparent, but the edges of the pool have borders of fresh turf, and the grass is always green. A nymph lives there—not one skilled in hunting or used to bending bows or to competing in a race—the only naiad unknown to swift Diana. Men say her sisters would often tell her:

‘Salmacis, pick up a javelin or painted quiver, and spend your idle hours in a vigorous hunt.’

But she will not take up a javelin or painted quiver or use her leisure time for active hunting. All she does is bathe her beautiful body in her own pool. Often with a Cyttorian boxwood comb she fixes her hair and then gazes down into the water to see what suits her. Wrapping herself in a transparent robe, she lies on piles of leaves or tender grass. She often gathers flowers, and, by chance, that’s what she was doing when she first glimpsed Hermaphroditus. And once she saw him, she wanted to possess him. Though eager to go up to him, she still did not approach, until she had composed herself, looked at her dress, arranged her face, and taken care so he would think her very beautiful. Only then did she begin to speak:

1Lycia and Caria are regions in Asia Minor.
'Young man, most worthy of being thought a deity, if you are a god, you could be Cupid, or if a mortal being, then your parents are blest, your brother happy, your sister, if you have one, fortunate—happy, too, the nurse who fed you at her breast. But still, far, far more powerfully blest than these is the girl betrothed to you, if you have a bride already, if there is some girl you plan to dignify with marriage. If so, if you do have someone, let's keep my love a secret. But if no such girl exists, then let me be your bride. Let's climb together into one common marriage bed.'

After this, the nymph was silent. A blush raced across the young man's face, for he was ignorant of what she meant by love, but blushing made him even more attractive—with a colour like apples hanging in a sunlit tree, or painted ivory, or like the moon during an eclipse, with a reddish tinge beneath her brightness, while bronze instruments crash out in vain. The nymph kept asking him to kiss her (she would not stop)—just one kiss, the way he'd kiss a sister—and by now had slipped her arms around his ivory neck. He cried:

'Stop that! Or shall I go away, desert this place and you!'

Salmacis was alarmed and answered:

'I freely leave this pool to you, stranger.'

Riley observes that during an eclipse of the moon, people often made noises with various instruments to counter the spells of witches and magicians who were, it was supposed, removing the moon from her proper sphere. These efforts are "in vain" because in a full eclipse the moon does momentarily disappear. I have added the phrase "during an eclipse" to make the reference somewhat clearer.
She turns aside
and pretends that she is going away.
But then, glancing back, she conceals herself, kneeling down behind a clump of bushes and staying near the ground. So the young lad, thinking he is unobserved, wanders round
here and there on the lonely grass and dips his toes and then his feet up to the ankles in the playful pool, and, captivated by the tempting coolness of the water, without delay he strips the soft clothes from his youthful body. Well, Salmacis is truly thrilled—inflamed now with desire for his naked flesh. The nymph’s eyes burn like the bright orb of the most brilliant Sun when its mirror image is reflected back.
She has trouble remaining where she is, trouble suppressing her delight. She wants to embrace him now. She is already in a frenzy and finds it difficult to keep herself in check. Hermaphroditus clops his hollow palms against his body and nimbly dives down deep into the pool.
As he moves one arm and then the other,
he gleams in the clear water, just as if someone had enclosed an ivory figure or beautiful white lily in clear glass.
The nymph cries out:

‘I have won! He is mine!’

Then flinging all her clothing to one side, she jumps into the middle of the pool and grabs him. He resists. In the struggle, she steals kisses, and her hands caress him down below and touch his unwilling breast.
She entwines her body around the youth first one way, then another. Finally, while he fights back against her, still hoping to escape, she enfolds him like a snake which the royal bird has snatched and carried high into the air—as it hangs down, it twists around the eagle’s head and feet, its tail coiling round the spreading wings, or like ivy winding itself around tall trunks of trees, or like a squid which grasps the enemy
it catches in the sea by sending out its tentacles and gripping every part.
The descendant of Atlas does not yield and denies the nymph the joys she longs for.¹ She persists, pressing her entire body to his, as if they were glued together.
She cries:

‘You may fight, you obstinate youth,
but still you won’t escape. And so, you gods, please grant that no day ever comes to take this youth away from me or me from him.’

Gods hear her prayers. The entwined bodies of the two of them are joined together and grow into a single form, just like when someone looks at branches where the bark has been cut back to graft them into one,
so they join, grow, and mature together.
In the same way, when their limbs intertwine
in a firm embrace, there are not two of them, but one single dual form. One could say they are not male or female. They appear neither one nor the other—or else both.

When he sees that the clear pool he entered as a man has made him only half a man and that in it his limbs have lost their strength, Hermaphroditus stretches out his arms and shouts, but in a voice no longer male:

‘Father and mother, grant your son this gift—he carries both your names. Whoever comes to this pool as a man, let him leave here half a man, and, once these waters touch him, let him become effeminate.’

Both parents,
moved by this speech from their bi-gendered son,

¹Hermaphroditus’s father was Hermes (Mercury), whose mother, Maia, was a daughter of the Titan Atlas.
BOOK FOUR

granted his request and poisoned the pool with a pernicious drug.”

Alcithoë
had brought her story to an end. But still,
the daughters of Minyas continued with their work, rejecting the god Bacchus, discrediting his festival. And then, suddenly, harsh noises from drums they could not see broke out, pipes with curving horns resounded, cymbals clashed, smells of myrrh and saffron spread all through the air, and (something beyond belief!) their looms started to turn green, the fabric hanging there grew leaves and looked like ivy.
Some of it came out as vines, and those parts which were threads before changed into tendrils.
Vine shoots sprouted from the warp, and purple grapes in clusters took on the splendid colours of the weaving. By now the day was past.
The hour had come at which one could not say whether it was dark or light—there was light, but surrounded by uncertain darkness.
All at once, the rooftops shake, the oil lamps seem to blaze, houses burn with reddish fire,
and phantom images of wild beasts howl.
By now the three sisters have been hiding for a while in smoky rooms, avoiding the fire and light in several places.
While they are seeking shadowy corners,
membranes are stretched across their slender limbs, covering their arms with tenuous wings.
The darkness does not let them realize how they have lost the form they used to share.
They have no feathers to raise them upward,
but lift themselves on their translucent wings,
and when they attempt to speak, they send out
a very tiny noise, to match their shape, voicing their grievances in minute squeaks.
They live in houses, not the woods. Hating the light, they fly at night, and take their name, vespertilio, or bat, from vesper, the late hours of evening.¹

After this, the divine magnificence of Bacchus was indeed talked about in all of Thebes, and his mother’s sister, Ino, spoke out everywhere about the mighty power of this new god. She was the only one out of all those sisters who had no cause for sorrow, other than the grief brought on by what her sisters had endured.² Juno looks at this woman, who is filled with pride that she has sons, is wife to Athamas, and has a foster child who is a god.³ Unable to endure it, Juno mutters to herself:

“Could that offspring of a slut change those Maeonian sailors, throw them in the sea, give the carcass of a son to his own mother to be torn apart, and cover those three daughters of Minyas with new wings, and Juno be unable to do a thing, except mourn her sorrows without taking revenge?⁴ Is this enough for me? Is this all the power I have? Bacchus himself has taught me what to do (one is allowed to learn from enemies). With the death of Pentheus, he has shown, more than enough, the power of madness. Why should Ino not be tormented, too, and pass through the stages of that frenzy shown by her sisters?”

---

¹In Latin the word for bat is vespertilio. I have added the word here and the English word bat, to clarify the etymological connection in the English text.

²Ino, daughter of Cadmus, had three sisters: Semele was destroyed by a lightning bolt from Jupiter, Agave helped rip her son, Pentheus, to pieces in a Bacchic frenzy, and Autonoe’s son, Actaeon, was turned into a stag and torn apart by his own hunting dogs.

³Ino helped raise the infant Bacchus.

⁴The “slut” in question is Semele, the mother of Bacchus, who had an affair with Jupiter (and hence does not rank very high with Juno).
There is a pathway going downhill, shaded by gloomy yews, which leads through silent, solitary spots to the world below, where the sluggish Styx breathes mists. Fresh ghosts of the dead pass this way, the forms of those who’ve had full burial rites. In all directions the place is dreary, pale, and freezing. New spirits of the dead are ignorant of the road which takes them to that city by the Styx, where black Dis has his grim palace. This roomy city has a thousand gateways and entrances open on all sides, and just as the sea absorbs rivers from all around the earth, in the same way this place receives all souls. There is no group for which it is too small, nor does it notice large crowds when they come. Bloodless shadows with no bones or bodies wander around. Some throng the market place, some the palace of the infernal king, and some keep busy working various trades, in imitation of their earlier life, while others suffer punishments to suit the wicked acts they have committed.

Juno, Saturn’s daughter, left her celestial home and forced herself to travel to this city (that’s how much her rage and fury drove her). As she went in the place, the threshold groaned, and Cerberus raised up his triple heads, then gave out three simultaneous howls. Juno called to those dreaded deities, the implacable sisters born from Night. They were sitting down in front of prison doors sealed up by steel, combing their black snake hair. As soon as they recognized the goddess

\[\text{\footnotesize\textsuperscript{1}}\text{Dis is another name for the god of the dead, who is usually called Pluto or Hades, and for his city in the Underworld.}\]
\[\text{\footnotesize\textsuperscript{2}}\text{The line about punishment (line 446 in the Latin) is sometimes omitted.}\]
\[\text{\footnotesize\textsuperscript{3}}\text{Cerberus, the dog guarding Hades, had three heads.}\]
\[\text{\footnotesize\textsuperscript{4}}\text{These three sisters, children of Night, are the Furies, the ancient goddess of blood revenge, especially within the family.}\] in the murky shadows, the Furies stood. The place is called the Home of the Accursed. Here Tityos stretches on nine acres, offering his entrails to be ripped apart. You, Tantalus, cannot scoop water up, and the tree which arches high overhead eludes you. You, Sisyphus, are always seeking out or pushing up that boulder, which will roll down again. Ixion spins, both following and fleeing from himself, and the granddaughters of Belus, who dared to plot their own cousins’ deaths, constantly fetch water once again, which they will lose.¹

With a grim scowl Juno gazes at them all, especially at Ixion. She looks from him once more to stare at Sisyphus and asks:

   “Why is this man being punished for eternity, whereas his brother, proud Athamas, has a wealthy palace and with his wife is always scorning me?”²

She explains why she detests that family and why she has come there. What she desires is that the house of Cadmus will collapse and sister Furies will drag Athamas into some crime. She asks those goddesses for help, mixing her commands with promises and prayers. Once Juno has stated her request, Tisiphone shakes her snow-white hair (which is,

¹This is a short catalogue of the best-known names of those punished in Hades. Tityos, a son of Jupiter and a creature of enormous size, attempted to rape Latona and was killed by Apollo. In Hades his liver was constantly devoured by a vulture and kept growing back. Tantalus, another son of Jupiter, offended the gods (different accounts give different reasons) and was punished by being unable to drink the water from the pool in which he was standing or eat the fruit in a tree overhead. Sisyphus was punished for various crimes. He had to push a large rock uphill, but just as he was about to reach the top, the rock rolled down again. Ixion attempted to seduce Juno and was tied to a wheel which kept him revolving. The granddaughters of Belus (a king of Egypt) are the daughters of Danaus (the Danaïds), who killed their husbands (who were also their cousins) on their wedding night. They were condemned to spending all their time filling jars from which the water quickly leaked out.

²Sisyphus and Athamas (Ino’s husband) were both sons of Aeolus, god of the winds.
as usual, dishevelled), flinging back
the snakes which block her mouth, and says these words:

“No need for long and complex explanations.
Those things you ordered—consider them done.
Leave this dreary kingdom, and take yourself back to the more pleasant air of heaven.”

Juno was delighted and returned back home.
As she was moving into heaven, Iris, Thaumas’ daughter, purified the goddess
by sprinkling her with water.

Dread Tisiphone
did not delay. She took a blood-soaked torch, put on a cloak dyed red with dripping gore,
fastened a coiling snake around her waist, and left the house. She was accompanied by Grief and Fear and Terror and Madness (who has an anguished face). She went and stood right at the gates of Aeolus’s home.
Men say the entrance shook, the maple doors turned pale, and the sun fled from the palace.
These ominous signs made Ino fearful,
and her husband, Athamas, was terrified.
They tried to leave the house, but Tisiphone, the menacing Fury, stood in the way and blocked the door. She stretched out both her arms wrapped in knots of vipers, and shook her hair.
The snakes hissed with the motion, some coiling across her shoulders, some around her breast, making whistling noises, vomiting gore, and flickering their tongues. Then the Fury pulled two snakes from the middle of her hair.
Her pestilential hand hurled what it seized,
and the two snakes slithered across the chests of Athamas and Ino, breathing poison on them. No wounds appeared on any limb.
It was their minds that felt the dreadful blow.
Tisiphone carried with her a vile potion of venomous fluids—foam from the mouth of Cerberus, poison from Ecidna, wandering delusions, the oblivion
of a clouded mind, wickedness, weeping, mad rage, and a love of slaughter, all these in a compound mix. She had blended them in fresh blood boiled in hollow bronze and stirred with a green hemlock stalk. While Athamas and Ino stood there shaking, Tisiphone poured this maddening poison on their chests, infecting the deep centres of the hearts in both of them. Repeatedly she whirled a torch in a constant circle and soon enveloped them with fire roused by her flame. So, having overpowered them and done what Juno ordered, she made her way back to the dead realm of mighty Dis and there took off the snake she’d placed around her waist.

Athamas instantly goes mad, screaming in the middle of the hall:

“Come, my friends, spread nets across these woods. I have just seen a lioness with twin cubs.”

Quite insane, he tracks the footsteps of his wife, as if she were a savage beast, and he snatches his own child Learchus from his mother’s grasp— the boy is smiling, waving his small arms— whirls him around in the air, like a sling, two or three times, and brutally smashes his infant skull against a solid rock. Then the mother, finally roused to act (whether that is caused by grief or poison spread all through her), runs, tearing her hair and howling madly. In her naked arms she holds a little boy (that child is you, Melicertes) and keeps on crying out:

“Evoe! Bacchus!”

---

1Echidna was the wife of the monster Typhoëus and the mother of a number of important mythological monsters (the Chimaera, Sphinx, Lernaean Hydra, Cerberus, and others).

2“Evoe!” is a cry uttered by those celebrating a Bacchic ritual.
At the name Bacchus
Juno laughs and says:

“May your foster child
bring you benefits like these.”

Above the sea
there is an overhanging rock, whose base has been hollowed out by breaking surf.
It shields the waves it shelters from the rain.
The prominent summit extends its brow out to the open sea. Ino clammers up this pinnacle (madness gives her strength, and no fear holds her back), then throws herself
and the child she carries down into the sea,
and where she lands the waves turn white with foam.

But Venus, pitying the afflictions of her grandchild, who did not deserve them, pleaded with her uncle, trying to charm him:¹

‘O Neptune, god of the sea, whose power ranks next to the might of heaven, it’s true I’m asking something great, but take pity on the ones I love. You can see them now being tossed out in the huge Icarian Sea.
Add them to your company of ocean gods.
I, too, enjoy some favour with the sea,
since I was once created from the foam in the middle of the deep and still have my Greek name, Aphrodite or ‘foam born,’ from the place where I arose.”

She begged, and Neptune nodded his consent. He removed from them their mortal parts, and in their place he set a sacred majesty. He also changed their bodies and their names, calling Ino Leucothoë and the child Palaemon.

Ino’s Sidonian companions followed,
as best they could, the imprints of her feet

¹Venus is the mother of Harmonia, Ino’s mother.
and saw their final traces at the front edge of the rock. They believed there was no doubt the two had died, so they started wailing for the House of Cadmus, their hands tearing their hair and clothing. They blamed the goddess. She had not acted justly and had been too harsh towards her rival. But Juno would not put up with their complaints and said:

“I will make you the greatest monuments to my ferocity.”

She made the threat then acted. For one of those companions who had been very fond of Ino said:

“I will go with the queen into the sea.”

She was about to leap out from the cliff, but she could not move at all. She was stuck, fixed to the rock. A second companion, when she tried to beat her breasts in mourning in the usual way, felt her arms grow stiff, as she was trying to lift them. And one, who by chance happened to extend her hand out above the waves, was turned to stone, her hands still pointing to those very waves. You could see the fingers on another, as they clutched her head and tugged her hair, suddenly harden in among the strands.

In whatever stance each of them was caught, there she stayed. Some of those Theban women were transformed to birds, whose wings, even now, skim across the surface waters of that gulf.

Cadmus, Agenor’s son, is not aware that his daughter and his infant grandson are now gods of the sea. Overwhelmed with grief, by the succession of catastrophes, and by astonishing events (of which he’s witnessed an enormous number), he leaves Thebes, the city he has founded, as if the troubles overwhelming him come from the place and not from him. Forced to wander far and wide with his wife, also exiled, Cadmus reaches the borders of Illyria.
By now worn down by anguish and old age,
they look back on the first fateful events their house went through, and, in conversations, review what they have suffered. Cadmus says:

“Was that serpent I butchered with my spear a sacred creature, back when I set out from Sidon and sowed a new kind of seed, those dragon’s teeth, into the earth? If so, if the firm anger of the gods is working to avenge that beast, I pray I myself may stretch into an elongated snake.”

As he speaks, he changes to a serpent with an extended belly. He senses scales growing across his hardening skin.
His body is now black, blue-green spots appear in various places, he falls down prostrate on his chest, his legs, little by little,
join together into one and thin out into a tapering point. His arms remain.
What he has left of them he stretches out,
with tears flowing down his still human face,
and says:

“O wife, my most unhappy wife,
come here while something of me still remains.
Touch me. Take my hand while it is a hand, before the snake has taken all of me.”

He really wishes to say more, but his tongue is suddenly divided in two parts.
He desires to speak, but no words come out.
Whenever he tries to utter a complaint,
he makes a hissing sound. This is the voice Nature has assigned him.

His wife, Harmonia,
her hand striking her naked breast, cries out:

\[\text{For Ovid's account of Cadmus and the serpent see 3.40 ff.}\]
“Stay here, Cadmus, you unfortunate man! Get rid of this atrocious form! Cadmus, what’s going on? Where is your foot, your hands, shoulders, colour, face? All of you has gone, while I’ve been speaking! You heavenly gods, why not me, too? Why not change me as well into the same form of snake?”

She said this, and her husband licked her face, then slithered to his wife’s dear breasts, as if he knew them. He squeezed her, seeking her familiar neck. Those present (their companions were all there) were fearful, but she stroked the slippery neck of the crested snake. And then suddenly there were two of them gliding along, coiled together, until they both disappeared into the shadows of a near-by wood. Now they do not flee from human beings or wound and harm them. They are peaceful snakes, recalling what they were in earlier days.

But even in this changed form, their grandson, Bacchus, offered them great consolation. He conquered India and was worshipped there. In Achaean throngs of people gather in temples built for him. Acrisius, son of Abas, who shares his lineage, is the only one still left who keeps on forbidding Bacchus entry through the walls of his Argive city, and takes up arms against the god, thinking he does not stem from Jupiter.¹ And he does not believe that Perseus, whom Danaë conceived in a shower of gold, is Jupiter’s son.² But soon (so great is the power of truth) Acrisius regrets he harmed the god and refused to recognize his grandson.

¹Acrisius was the son of Abas, king of Argos.
²Danaë was the daughter of Acrisus. Jupiter, in the form of a shower of gold, had sex with her and Perseus was the result of their union (as Perseus reveals in a speech later in this book).
Bacchus had taken his place in heaven, but Perseus was rushing through thin air on whirring wings, bearing the famous prize of a snake-haired monster he had overcome, soaring over Libyan sands, with blood dripping down to earth from the Gorgon’s head. The ground soaked up the drops and gave them life as various snakes (that is the reason so many snakes infest this land). Later, Perseus was carried off here and there, pushed by warring winds, like a cloud of rain. From high up in the heavens he gazed down on distant lands. He flew around the globe. Three times he saw the freezing Bears, three times the pincers of the Crab, often driven to the west, and often towards the east. Now, as light failed, afraid to trust himself to the dark night, he halted in the west, intending to rest awhile in the realm of Atlas, until Lucifer announced Aurora’s fire, and Aurora summoned the chariot of day.

Now, this Atlas, son of Iapetus, surpassed all men in physical size and was the ruler of the remotest regions of the world and of the oceans whose waters receive the panting horses of the Sun and take in his weary chariot. He has a thousand flocks and as many herds, who roam the meadows. There are no neighbours to disturb his land. Leaves on his trees glitter with shining gold, covering golden boughs and golden fruit. Perseus said:

“My friend, if the glory of high birth has some influence with you, the founder of my clan is Jupiter. If you are someone who applauds great deeds,

---

1 The Gorgons were three monstrous sisters whose gaze could turn people to stone. In some accounts two of them were immortal; the third, Medusa, was not. Perseus is carrying Medusa’s head.
you will approve of mine. I’m asking you for hospitality and rest.”

Atlas recalled an ancient prophecy given by Themis at Parnassus:

“The time will come, Atlas, when your trees will be stripped of gold. A son of Jupiter will be honoured for acquiring the spoil.”

Afraid of this, Atlas built strong walls around his orchard and placed in there an enormous dragon to protect the place. He kept all strangers off his lands. So he said to Perseus:

“Leave here, in case the glory of those deeds you lie about and Jupiter, as well, are not there to help.”

To these threatening words Atlas added violence, attempting with his great hands to push Perseus away. Perseus holds his ground, combining force with reassuring words. But Perseus is not as powerful (for who can match the strength of Atlas?). So Perseus says:

“Very well, then, since for you my friendship has no value, take this gift!”

He turns away and with his left hand holds out the foul head of Medusa, and Atlas is transformed into a mountain as huge as he was. His beard and hair turn into forest trees, his hands and shoulders change to mountain crests. What was his head before is now the peak. His bones are turned to rock. All his features start to grow much larger, and he becomes something colossal (so you gods ordained), and all the heavens with their countless stars
now rest on him.1

Aeolus had confined
the winds to their prison caves on Aetna, and Lucifer, the brightest of all stars,
who rouses men for work, had risen up high in the heavens.2 Perseus put on his wings again, tying them to his feet.
Then he took his weapon, a curving sword, and with the movement of his sandals’ wings carved out a passage through the flowing air.
Passing countless nations in lands below
on every side, he came to Ethiopia, oberved the people there, and saw the fields of Cepheus, where Jupiter Ammon had unjustly ordered that Andromeda, though innocent, should suffer punishment for things her mother said.3 When Perseus, grandson of Abas, saw the girl, whose arms were chained to solid rock, he would have thought she was a marble statue, but her hair moved in the gentle breezes, and warm tears flowed from her eyes. Before he realized it, Perseus caught fire. Amazed and smitten by the image of the girl he saw there, he almost forgot to keep those wings of his beating in the air. He came down, stopped, and said:

“These are not the chains you should be wearing,
but rather those which link up those in love.
Tell me your name and what your land is called—I’d like to know—and why you are in chains.”

---

1 Atlas kept the heavens and earth apart by bearing the weight of heaven on his shoulders.
2 Aeolus is god of the winds. Aetna is an active volcano in Sicily. Lucifer “rouses men for work” because he is the morning star who announces the coming of Dawn.
3 Jupiter was worshipped in Libya (under the name Jupiter Ammon), where there was a famous temple and oracle dedicated to him. Andromeda was the daughter of Cepheus, the ruler of the region. Her mother, Cassiope, had boasted about her own beauty, comparing it to the nereids (nymphs of the sea, daughters of Nereus). The nereids had asked Neptune for a sea monster to attack the Ethiopians, and the oracle had declared that, to avert disaster, Andromeda had to be sacrificed to the monster. So she was tied to a rock washed by the sea (where the monster could attack her).
At first the girl said nothing, not daring, as a virgin, to talk to a strange man. Her hands would have concealed her modest face, as well, if she had not been bound. She did what she could do and let her eyes fill up with flowing tears. He kept on asking her repeatedly, and she, so as not to seem to be confessing that she was at fault by her unwillingness to say a word, told him her name, her country, and how much her mother had believed in her own beauty.

Before she has finished all the details, the waves roar, and out of the boundless deep a threatening monster bursts up, covering a wide surface of the sea. The virgin screams. Her father and her mother stand close by, feeling wretched (the mother more justly so). They bring no help with them, but cries of grief to suit the moment. They both beat their breasts, clinging to the body of the chained-up girl. Then the stranger says:

“You can shed your tears for a long time after this, but right now there is not much time to help. My name is Perseus, Jupiter’s son with Danaë. Although she was imprisoned, Jupiter made her pregnant with streams of fertile gold. Yes, I am Perseus, who overcame the snake-haired Gorgon and dared to travel through gusting breezes on these beating wings. So if I seek this young girl as my wife, surely as a son-in-law I will rank ahead of all the rest. And if the gods will only show me favour, I will try to add a further service to those things I have accomplished. Here’s my proposal—if my courage saves her, then she is mine.”

Her parents agree to his conditions (for who would hesitate?). They plead with him and promise even more. They offer him their kingdom as a dowry.
Then, just as the sharp prow of a swift ship driven on by the sweating arms of its youthful crew cuts through the waves, so the powerful chest of that sea monster shoves the waves aside.
When its distance from the rock is as far as a Balearic sling can send its shot whirling through the air, Perseus suddenly sets his feet against the earth, then rises up high into the clouds. As his shadow falls across the surface of the sea, the beast sees it and, enraged, attacks the shadow.
Just as Jupiter’s eagle, when it spies a snake in an open field exposing its dark back to Phoebus and seizes it as it turns away, sinking sharp talons in its scaly neck, in case it twists back its savage fangs, so Perseus, descendant of Inachus, swooping down rapidly through the empty sky, suddenly makes for the monster’s back and, as it roars, buries his sword in its right shoulder, all the way to the curving hilt. The sea beast, now hurt with a serious wound, sometimes lifts itself high in the air or sinks beneath the waves, and sometimes turns at bay, like a fierce boar surrounded and driven mad by a pack of yelping hounds. Using his speeding wings, Perseus eludes the ravenous jaws and, every time he sees an opening, strikes with his curved blade—now along its back, crusted with hollow shells, now at its ribs along the flanks, now at the thinnest part of the creature’s tail, which tapers like a fish.
The monster’s mouth spews out sea water mixed with purple blood, drenching his sandal wings and weighing them down. Perseus does not dare to trust his soaking wings. He spies a rock whose topmost point extends above the sea when it is still but which is covered up when the waters surge. Standing on that rock, his left hand braced against the upper edge,
he strikes the monster’s side repeatedly,
three or four times, plunging in his sword.
The shores and the high palaces of gods resound with noisy shouting and applause. Cassiope and Cepheus, her father, are delighted. They greet their son-in-law, acknowledging him as the one who helped and saved their house. The girl, freed from her chains, approaches, the cause of all his efforts and the reward. Perseus himself cleans his victorious hands in water drawn up from the sea. Then he makes a bed of leaves to soften the ground, so as not to harm the snake head on the solid sand, spreads out plants born beneath the sea, and sets down there the head of Medusa, Phorcys’ daughter. The absorbent centres of that seaweed, still living, soak up the Gorgon’s power, at, at its touch, grow hard. The stems and leaves take on a new rigidity. Sea nymphs try out this miracle on several plants, and when they all grow hard in the same way, the nymphs rejoice. They repeat the process by scattering seeds from those rock-hard growths into the sea. And corals, even now, retain this property. They petrify in contact with the air, and what lives on below the water turns to stone above.

Perseus raises three earth-built altars to three deities—the one on the left to Mercury, the right hand one to you, virgin warrior Minerva, and one between the two to Jupiter. He offers a cow in sacrifice to Minerva, a calf to Mercury, wing-footed god, and a bull to Jupiter, who rules the gods. Perseus quickly claims Andromeda as his reward for such a great exploit, without a dowry. In front of both of them Hymen and Love hold up the marriage torch, fires are filled with huge amounts of incense, garlands hang from rooftops, and everywhere the melodies resound from lyres, pipes, and song, delightful symbols of a happy heart. All the golden halls lie open, their doors thrown back, and the Ethiopian leaders move to a banquet beautifully prepared and set before them.

When the banquet ends
and they have filled their hearts with wine, a gift from munificent Bacchus, Perseus, descendant of Lyneus, asks about the culture and the people of the place, their character and habits. One of those present at the feast answers his questions and then says:

“And now, most brave Perseus,
I beg you to describe the bravery and skill you used to carry off that head with snakes for hair.”

Agenor’s descendant
then tells them how there is a cave below the icy slopes of Atlas, safely tucked inside its solid mass. In the entrance dwelt the daughters of Phorcys, two sisters, who had just one eye to share between them.
He had stolen that eye with a deft trick,
by putting out his hand while the sisters were exchanging it. And then he describes how he went through distant, hidden places, hard to reach, and rocks bristling with dense woods, and reached the Gorgons’ homes, how he had seen everywhere in fields and roadways the forms of wild beasts and men who, after looking at Medusa, had changed from what they were to stone, how he himself had nonetheless gazed at dread Medusa’s shape reflected in the shining shield he held on his left arm, how, while she and her snakes were sound asleep,
he had sliced through her neck and seized her head,
how Pegasus, the winged, swift-flying horse,

1Lyneus was the great-grandfather of Danaë, Perseus’ mother.
2During the exchange the sisters could not see, so that the one passing the eye mistook Perseus’s hand for her sister’s.
was born from Medusa’s blood—his brother, too.¹ He tells them of the dangers he went through in his long trip (and these were not made up), the seas and lands he had seen under him while he was flying up high, and stars he touched when he spread out his wings. Then he fell silent, while they were still expecting to hear more. One of the leaders there spoke out, asking why Medusa was the only sister who had snakes tangled in her locks of hair. Their guest responded:

“Since your question involves a story well worth telling, listen—here is the answer to what you just asked. Medusa was once extremely beautiful, the envious hope of many suitors. Of all her features, none was lovelier than her hair. I found a man who told me he had seen it. People say that Neptune, who rules the sea, attacked her sexually in Minerva’s temple, and the daughter of Jupiter turned away, concealing her pure face behind her aegis. And then, to make sure the act was not unpunished, she changed the Gorgon’s hair to filthy snakes. And now, to terrify her enemies, to stun them all with fear, on her breastplate, in the front, she wears those snakes she made.”²

¹The brother of Pegasus was Chrysaor, sometimes depicted as a young man, sometimes as a flying beast or monster.
²When Minerva goes into battle, the Gorgon’s head is painted on her armour or shield.
BOOK V

[Phineus interrupts Perseus’s wedding feast; an armed conflict ensues; Perseus holds up Medusa’s head and turns his enemies to stone, including Phineus; Perseus overcomes Proetus and Polydectes in the same way; Minerva visits the Muses on Mount Helicon; Urania talks of Pyreneus’ madness and tells Minerva about the singing contest with the daughters of Pierus: how those daughters sang about the war of the Giants and the cowardice of the Olympians; Urania tells Minerva of Calliope’s song about the Rape of Proserpine: how Venus instructed Cupid to shoot an arrow at Pluto, how Pluto abduced Proserpine, how Cyane tried to stop Pluto and was transformed; how Ceres searched for her daughter and, during her travels, changed a boy into a small lizard, how Cyane showed Ceres Proserpine’s belt, how Ceres took revenge against all Sicily, how Arethusa appealed to Ceres and told her where Proserpine was, how Ceres complained to Jupiter, how Jupiter mediated the dispute, how Proserpine ate the seeds which kept her part of the year in the Underworld, how the Sirens became birds, how Arethusa became a sacred pool, how Ceres sent Triptolemus to Asia with harvest seed, how Lyncus was changed into a lynx; the Muses are declared winners of the contest; Pierus’s daughters are changed to magpies.]

While the heroic son of Danaë was talking about these things in the midst of feasting with the Ethiopians, a noisy crowd filled the royal palace. The sound they made was not the merriment of a wedding feast but one announcing armed confrontation. The celebration instantly became a heated quarrel. You could compare it to a tranquil sea when the harsh fury of the winds whips up its moving waters. In this raucous group, first and foremost was Phineus, the man who had recklessly begun the conflict. Brandishing an ash spear with a bronze point, he cried:

“Look here! Over here! I have come to avenge my stolen bride! Those wings of yours won’t help you get away from me—nor will Jupiter, even if he is transformed into showers of false gold.”

Phineus is the brother of Cepheus, king of the Ethiopians and now Perseus’s father-in-law. The mention of “false gold” is a reference to Jupiter’s seduction of Danaë, the mother of Perseus, in which Jupiter transformed himself into a shower of gold.
As Phineus
was about to hurl his spear, Cepheus shouted at him:

“Brother, what are you doing?
What foolishness has made you so enraged and driven you to this illegal act?
Is this the gratitude a person shows for such great service? Is this your reward for the one who saved her life? If you want to know the truth, it was not Perseus who took her from you, no, but the stern god of the nereids, with that horned Ammon, Jupiter, and the monster from the sea,
who came to glut itself on my own child.
That was the moment she was snatched from you,
when she was going to die—unless that is just the thing you want, you cruel man, that she should die, so you can ease your heart to see me grieving. It’s not sufficient, I suppose, that when she was bound in chains
you just looked on and were no help at all,
and yet you were her uncle and the one she was to marry! And, besides all this,
are you upset because she was set free by someone else? Will you now take away his prize? If that reward appears to you so valuable, you should have sought her out among those rocks where she was held in chains.
Let the man who did step up to save her,
who spared me an old age without a child,
take what he was promised for his efforts.
Understand this: we did not value him more than you, but we thought him preferable to certain death.”

Phineus said nothing
in reply, but kept looking back and forth at Cepheus and Perseus, unsure which of the two he should aim his spear at.
After pausing for a moment, he hurled it,
with all the power his anger gave him,
at Perseus. But the throw was wasted.
The spear stuck in a cushion. Perseus then jumped up from where he was reclining and, in a fury, threw the spear right back and would have skewered his enemy’s chest, if Phineus had not ducked for refuge behind the altars which (to his great shame) offered the miserable wretch a shelter. But the spear point did not miss, for it struck Rhoetus in the forehead. The man collapsed. As the iron was pulled out from the bone, he kept on kicking and spraying his blood on fully laden tables. At that point, the crowd could not control its blazing rage. They threw their weapons. There were people there who said Cepheus and his son-in-law deserved to die. But Cepheus by now had left, moving past the palace doorway, calling on Trust and Justice and the gods of hospitality as witnesses that he had given orders to prevent what was going on. Warlike Pallas came to protect her brother with her aegis and give him courage.¹

There was a young man from India called Athis. People claim Limnace, child of the Ganges river, gave birth to him in its glassy waters. At just sixteen years of age, his beauty was outstanding, and he added to it with expensive clothing. He wore a cloak of Tyrian purple edged with gold, chains of gold around his neck, and a curved band in his perfumed hair. He was an expert with a javelin, who could throw and hit his target, no matter how far distant, but his ability to shoot a bow was even greater still. At that moment, his hands were flexing the supple horn tips on his bow, but then Perseus struck him with a log smouldering on the altar, crushing his face into his fractured skull. When the Assyrian Lycabas, who was ¹Minerva and Perseus are both children of Jupiter.

Athis’ dearest friend and who did not hide his genuine love, saw him with his face, which people praised so much, rolling in blood,
while he breathed out his life through that harsh wound, he wept for his companion as he snatched up the bow Athis had prepared and shouted:

“Now your quarrel is with me! You will not rejoice for long over a young boy’s death, an act which brings you more disgrace than praise.”

Before he had finished saying these words,
he launched a pointed arrow from his bowstring.
Perseus dodged, and the arrow hung up in a fold in Perseus’s clothing.
Acrisius’ grandson turned against him that curved sword, already tried and tested when he killed Medusa, and buried it deep inside his chest. Now in his death throes, Lycabas, eyes swimming in dark night,
looked round at Athis, fell down beside him,
and carried to the shadows of the dead
the solace that they had died together.

Then Phorbas from Syene, Metion’s son, and Libyan Amphimedon, eager to join in the fighting, slipped on the blood warming up the well-drenched earth around them.¹
They fell down. As they struggled to get up, Perseus’ sword stopped them, striking Phorbas
in the neck, and Amphimedon in the ribs.

Perseus did not use his sword to fight Erytus, son of Actor, whose weapon was a double axe. Instead, in both hands he hoisted up an enormous mixing bowl with many carved designs in high relief and very heavy and brought it crashing down on the man’s head. Erytus vomited red blood and, lying on his back, his head,
as he lay dying, kept hammering the ground.
Perseus slaughtered Polydaemon, born

¹Syene is a city on the edge of Ethiopia.
from blood of Semiramis, Abaris from Caucasus, Lycetus, who came from lands beside the Spercheus, Helices with flowing hair, Clytus and Phlegyas.
Perseus trampled on the heaped-up piles of dying men.¹

Phineus, not daring
to challenge his enemy hand to hand, threw a spear which by mistake hit Ida,
who was trying to stay out of the fight and not help either side, without success.
Glaring angrily at frenzied Phineus
he said:

“Since you compel me to choose sides, Phineus, you should acknowledge the enemy
you made, and compensate me for this wound with an injury of your own.”

On the point
of throwing back the spear he had now pulled out of his body, he collapsed and died.
His limbs were drained of blood.

Then Hodites,
the most important noble in the country
after king Cepheus, died on the sword of Clymenus, Hypseus killed Prothoënor, and Perseus then cut down Hypseus.

With them was an older man, Emathion,
who believed in justice and feared the gods.
Since his great age kept him out of combat,
he battled on with words, moving forward and denouncing these criminal attacks.
As his trembling hands clung to the altar,
Chromius swung his sword and sliced his head off.
It fell straight down, right on the altar,
where the tongue, still half alive, kept speaking ¹Spercheus is a river in Thessaly in northern Greece.

words of condemnation. Then its spirit, in the middle of the fire, breathed its last.¹

The two brothers Brotes and Ammon, who were invincible in boxing, fell at the hand of Phineus (if only their boxing gloves could have defeated swords!), along with Ampycus, priest of Ceres, who wore white ribbons around his forehead, and you, too, Lampetides, who should not have been invited to participate in such a battle, for you were a man who did peaceful work, chanting melodies and playing the lyre. You had been ordered to attend, bringing music to the feast and celebration. Pedasus mocked you, standing there with your unwarlike plectrum. He cried out:

“Go sing all your other songs to Stygian shades!”

Then he drove his sword in your left temple. You, Lampetides, collapsed and, with your dying fingers, tried to pluck your lyre strings once more and played, as you sank down, a mournful tune. That death ferocious Lycormas would not permit to go unpunished. From the right doorpost he seized a heavy bar and brought it down on Pedasus, shattering the middle of his bony neck. He dropped to the ground, like a bull at some ritual sacrifice. Pelates, who lived by the river Cinyps, went to pull a bar out of the doorpost on his left, but as he tried to do this, a spear from Marmarican Corythus pierced his right hand and pinned it to the wood.² While he was impaled there, Abas struck him in the side. Pelates did not fall down, but, as he died, was held up by his hand.

¹The altar would have a fire burning on it.
²Cinyps is the name of a river in northern Africa. Marmarica is a reference to Africa. and hung there on the post. And Melaneus, one of those who supported Perseus, was also butchered, as was Dorylas, owner of the wealthiest properties in Nasamonia—so rich in land, no other man had such extensive fields or harvested so many heaped-up spices.¹ A spear thrown from the side stuck in his groin, a fatal wound. When Halcyoneus from Bactria, the one who’d thrown the spear, saw Dorylas rolling his eyes, panting his last breath, he shouted:

“Of all your lands keep this small patch of earth on which you lie!”²

He left the bloodless corpse. But Perseus, avenging heir of Abas, pulled the spear from the hot wound and threw it back again at Halcyoneus. It hit his face in the middle of his nose, kept moving, drove through his neck, and stuck out on both sides.

Fortune kept his hand strong, and Perseus slaughtered in different ways two men born from the same mother—Clytius and Clanis. For an ash spear hurled with his strong arm drove through both thighs of Clytius, and Clanis bit down on a spear head driven in his mouth. Mendesian Celadon was also killed, and Astreus fell (his mother came from Palestine, his father was uncertain).³ Once skilled in prophesying the future, Aethion was on this occasion tricked by a false omen. Thoactes perished, amour bearer to the king, and so did Agyrtes, who was disgraced for killing his own father.

¹Nasamonia is region of Libya, in northern Africa.
²Bactria is a country bordering India on the west.
³Mendes is a city in Egypt, near the mouth of the Nile.
Perseus was weary, but he had more enemies to deal with, every one determined to cut him down. Around him armed groups of conspirators were fighting on, in a cause attacking his own merit and good faith. On his side, his father-in-law gave loyal support, but that had no effect, and his new wife and mother filled the hall with their laments. But the clash of weapons and dying groans of fallen men drowned out their cries of grief. The war goddess Bellona, all the while, drenched the polluted household gods with blood and stirred up further conflict.¹

Phineus and the thousand men still fighting at his side encircle Perseus, all by himself. Thicker than winter hail, the spears fly by on either side of him, past eyes and ears. He sets his shoulders hard against a pillar, a large one made of stone, and with his back protected turns against the hostile throng and holds them off. On his left, Molpeus, a Chaonian, moved up to attack, and on his right Ethemon from Nabataea.² Just as a tiger driven by hunger hears lowing noises from two cattle herds in different valleys and has no idea which way it would prefer to charge ahead (it even wants to rush both herds at once), so Perseus pauses. Should he take on the person to his right or to his left? He drives off Molpeus, striking a blow that penetrates his leg and is content to see him go, for Ethemon gives him no time to pause, but charges in a rage, eager to wound him high up on his neck, slashes at him with reckless violence, hits the pillar along its outer edge, and breaks apart his sword. The blade flies off ¹Bellona is a sister of Mars, god of war.

²Chaonia is region in north-west Greece. Nabataea is a region in Arabia. and sticks in its owner’s throat. But the blow is not severe enough to bring on death. Ethemon trembles and holds out his hands which hold no weapon, but in vain. Perseus stabs him with his curved Cyllenian sword.¹

But when Perseus saw the sheer numbers would overwhelm his courage, he shouted:

“Since you yourselves are forcing me to it, I’ll seek help from my enemy. So if anyone here is still a friend of mine, turn away your face.”

He said this and pulled out the Gorgon’s head. Thesulus shouted back:

“Find other men on whom your miracles might have some effect!”

With that, Thesulus bent his arm to hurl his deadly javelin. But he was frozen in the very act, like a marble statue. And then Ampyx, who was standing right next to Thesulus, thrust out his sword at Perseus’ heart, so filled with his indomitable courage, but as he did so, his right hand stiffened. It would not move at all, back or forward. Then Nileus, who used to falsely claim he was descended from the river Nile, with its seven mouths, and who also had its seven branches etched into his shield, some parts in silver, some in gold, cried out:

“Look, Perseus! Gaze on the origin of my race. You will take to silent shades this consolation for your death—the fact that you were killed by such a noble man.”

¹Perseus’ sword was a gift from the god Mercury, who was born on Mount Cyllene in Arcadia. The sword is curved, like a scimitar.
In the last part of his speech, his voice stopped, choking on its words. You could well believe his open mouth wanted to keep speaking, but the words lacked any way of getting out.

Eryx criticized the men and shouted:

“Your own cowardice has paralyzed you, not the Gorgon’s force. Join me and attack! Knock this young man waving magic weapons down to the ground!”

He was about to charge, but the ground stopped him in his tracks. He stood, immobile, and remained there, an armed man, but now an image made of stone.

These men received the punishment they well deserved, but there was a man named Aconteus, a warrior supporting Perseus, who, while battling there on his behalf, glimpsed the Gorgon’s face, froze, and was turned to stone. Thinking he was still alive, Astyages swung his sword and slashed him. The steel rang out with a noisy clang. While Astyages stood dumfounded, his nature was transformed as well, in the same way. The amazed expression still sat there on his marble face.

To list the names of the common folk who perished would take too long: two hundred men survived the fight, two hundred bodies turned to stone, once they saw the Gorgon’s head. Phineus finally regrets the unjust quarrel. But what is he to do? He sees the statues in various attitudes, recognizes his own friends, calls them by name, asks their help, and in disbelief touches the bodies next to him—all marble. He turns aside and, confessing what he’s done, lifts his hands like a suppliant, holds out both his arms, and says:
“You win, Perseus! Put away your monster, that face of yours which changes men to stone. Get rid of that Medusa, whoever she may be. I’m begging you—get rid of her! I was not pushed to fight out of hatred or a desire to rule. I reached for weapons to get back my wife. Your suit had greater merit, but my claim had precedence. So I am not ashamed to yield. Bravest of men, give me nothing except my life. Let all the rest be yours.”

As Phineus said this, he did not dare look at the man to whom he was directing his appeal. Perseus replied:

“Phineus, you most cowardly of men, I will give what I can, a great reward for someone who is so timid. Do not be afraid. I will not hurt you with my sword. What’s more, I’ll even give you a memorial to last forever, and in the palace of my father-in-law you will be seen all the time, so my wife can find relief in the image of the man she was to wed.”

Perseus spoke and then shifted the head of Phorcys’ daughter over to the spot where Phineus had turned his frightened face. He tried to avert his gaze, but his neck grew rigid, and the liquid in his eyes hardened into stone. But in that marble his timid look and supplicating face remained, as well as his submissive hands and abject stance.

Victorious Perseus enters Argos, his ancestral city, with his wife. To protect his grandfather, Acrisius, and avenge him (even though he does not deserve his help) he attacks Proetus, who has launched an armed assault against Acrisius, who is his brother, puts him to flight, and then takes possession of his citadel. But neither his weapons nor the fortress he unjustly captured help him prevail against the glaring eyes of the snake-haired monster.

But Polydectes, king of tiny Seriphos, you remain obdurate, for all the young man’s courage, which his numerous exploits have confirmed, and his suffering. You nurse your hatred, harsh and unrelenting, and do not check your unjust anger. You even ridicule the praises he receives when you insist his claim he killed Medusa is quite false. Perseus says:

“I will provide you proof of what is true. All others, hide your eyes!”

And with Medusa’s head, he then transforms king Polydectes’ face to bloodless stone.

Up to now, Tritonian Minerva had accompanied her brother conceived in a shower of gold. But now, enclosed in a hollow cloud, she left Seriphos, and moving past Cythnus and Gyarus on her right, took what seemed the shortest route across the sea, making her way to Thebes and to Mount Helicon, the Muses’ home.¹ Once she reached the mountain, she halted there and addressed the learned sisters, saying:

“The fame of a new spring has reached our ears. It gushed out when struck by the solid hoof of that winged Pegasus, Medusa’s child. That is the reason for my journey here. I wish to see this amazing fountain.

¹The Muses, the divine patronesses of the arts and sciences, are the daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. There are nine of them. Cynthus is a mountain on Delos, Seriphos and Gyarus islands in the Cyclades group.
I myself saw Pegasus when he sprang from his mother’s blood.”

Urania answered:¹

“Goddess, whatever reason you may have for visiting our home, we are most grateful. Yes, that report is true. Pegasus is the origin of that fountain.”

She led the goddess to the sacred stream. For some time Minerva stood marvelling at the spring produced by a blow from the horse’s hoof. She gazed around at stands of ancient trees, caves, and grass adorned with countless flowers. She commended Mnemosyne’s daughters for their good fortune having such a place and, equally, for the fine work they did. One of the sisters answered with these words:

“Tritonian Pallas, if your own courage had not carried you to greater actions, you would have been one of our company. What you say is true. You are right to praise our arts and home. We have a happy lot, if only it were safe. But there’s no end to what wicked men may do, and all things bring fear to virgin minds. Before my eyes spins dreadful Pyreneus, and my mind, even now, has not been totally restored. That ferocious man had captured Daulis and Phocian lands with his men from Thrace and imposed his unjust rule on places he now held. We were going to the shrine at Mount Parnassus. As we were passing in the rain, he saw us there, and knowing who we were, his face put on a false look of reverence for our sacred presences, and he said:

¹Urania, one of the nine Muses, is the patron of astronomy.
'Daughters of Mnemosyne, stop here. Do not hesitate, I beg you, to shelter from the storm and heavy rain under my roof. Gods above have often gone in more humble dwellings.'

Persuaded by his words and by the rain, we agreed and went in the front part of his palace. The storm ended, and the clouds were flying from the sky, once North Wind overpowered winds from the south and darkness moved away. We wished to leave, but then Pyreneus locked up his home and was getting ready to turn violent. We escaped the place by taking to our wings. He stood high up, on the top part of his fortress, as if he was about to follow us, and cried:

'Whatever road you take, the selfsame road will be the one I use.'

Then, in his madness, he threw himself from the very summit of the tower and fell down on his face, fracturing his skull. As he lay dying, he beat the ground stained with his profane blood."

While the Muse said this, in the air they heard the sound of wings, and voices greeted them from branches high up in a tree. Minerva looked up to discover where those voices were coming from. The talk was so distinct, she thought a man was speaking. They were birds, nine magpies, who can copy any sound. Perched in the foliage, they were moaning about their fate. Minerva was surprised, so Urania explained:

"These creatures recently were beaten in a contest and were included in the flocks of birds. Pierus was their father, a wealthy man with great estates in Pella. Their mother, from Paeonia, was called Evippe.
She cried out to powerful Lucina nine times, for she was nine times in labour.¹
This group of foolish sisters took great pride
in their number and, when they reached this place, after journeying through many cities in Haemonia and Achaea, they launched a war of words and made the following boast:

‘You Thespian goddesses have to stop deceiving the stupid common masses with your sweet, vain songs, and, if you have faith in your own skill, you should compete with us.²
We will not be outmatched in voice or art, and our numbers equal yours. If you lose, you will hand over that spring created by Medusa’s child and Aganippe in Boeotia. If you win, we will leave the Emathian plains and move away as far as snowy Macedon. Let nymphs be judges in our competition.’³

It’s true
that entering a contest with those sisters was demeaning, but it seemed even worse to refuse the challenge. Nymphs were chosen.
They swore by their rivers they would be fair and then sat down on seats of natural rock.
We did not draw lots. The one who had first proposed the contest sang about the wars fought by gods above. She gave false honours to the Giants and debased the actions of the mighty gods.⁴ She went on to sing how Typhoëus came out of his den deep down inside the earth and terrorized those who lived in heaven, how all the gods turned tail and fled and tired themselves out,

¹Lucina was the goddess of childbirth.
²Thespis was traditionally the first actor. The term Thespian generally refers to performing artists, actors in particular.
³Aganippe is a fountain in Boeotia. Medusa’s child was Pegasus, whose hoof created the spring on Mount Helicon. Emathia is the name of a region Thessaly.
⁴The Giants were attempting to capture heaven. For Ovid’s account of the war see 1.208 ff.
until the land of Egypt and the Nile with its seven separate mouths took them in.
She sang how Typhoëus had then come to that land as well and how the gods above took on deceiving shapes to hide from him, claiming that Jupiter became a ram,
the leader of the flock (that’s why, she said, Ammon, even today, is depicted with curved horns). Apollo disguised himself as a crow, Semele’s son as a goat, Phoebus’ sister, Diana, as a cat,
Saturn’s daughter, Juno, as a white cow,
Venus as a fish, and the Cyllenean god, Mercury, as an ibis bearing wings. She sang as far as this, playing her cithara.
Then we were called upon for our response.
But perhaps you have no time at present and are not free to listen to our songs.”

Pallas said:

“Do not stop. Repeat for me your songs in the order you performed them.”

With that, Minerva sat down in the shade of a pleasant grove. The Muse continued:

“We gave the task of representing us in that challenge match to Calliope.¹ She got up, with an ivy wreath around her flowing hair. With her thumb she tested the plaintive strings. Then she sang this story, striking chords to accompany her song:

‘Ceres was the first to break up fertile ground with a curved plough, the first to give earth crops and wholesome food, the first to give us laws.
All things are gifts from Ceres, and Ceres is the subject of my story. If only I could sing something worthy of the goddess, for she is surely worthy of a song.

¹Calliope is the Muse responsible for heroic poetry.
The huge island of Sicily is piled above a Giant’s limbs. Its immense mass keeps Typhoëus buried underground, the one who was so bold he set his sights upon the realm of heaven. True, he tries to struggle and often fights to rise again, but his right arm is pinned down underneath Ausonian Pelorus, and you, Pachynus, hold down his left. Lilybaeum pushes on his legs, and Aetna presses down his head.\footnote{Pelorus, Pachynus, and Lilybaeum are the three capes defining the triangular shape of Sicily. Aetna (or Etna) is the famous (and still active) volcano in Sicily.}

Below it Typhoëus, flat on his back, hurls ash from his fierce mouth and vomits fire. He shifts around, trying to cast aside that weight of earth, to roll the mighty hills and cities off his body. Then Earth shakes. Then even the king of the silent world is afraid the ground might open up, split in a wide crack, and daylight might come in to scare the trembling shadows of the dead. Fearing such a great disaster, Pluto had left his shadowy dwelling place and, riding in a chariot with black horses, was carefully circling the foundations of Sicilian lands. After checking these and satisfying himself that no regions were unstable, he set aside his fears. As he moved around, Venus of Eryx sitting on her mountain, noticed Pluto.\footnote{Eryx is a mountain in Sicily associated with Venus.}

Embracing her winged son, she said:

‘Cupid, my son, my weapon, my hands, my power— take those arrows you use to overwhelm all beings, and shoot your swift-flying dart into the heart of Pluto, whose lot won the last of the three kingdoms.\footnote{The “lot” is a reference to the time when Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto drew lots to divide up the three realms of the sky, the sea, and the Underworld.} Your great might conquers gods above, even Jupiter, and makes them subject to you—gods of the sea, as well, and the one who rules them all.
Why leave out Tartarus? Why should you not expand your mother’s kingdom and your own?
The stakes are high—a third part of the world!
I patiently endure the way we’re scorned, especially in heaven. Love’s power is on the wane, together with my own.
Do you not see how huntress Diana has abandoned me, along with Pallas, too?
And if we allow it, that child of Ceres will remain a virgin. She wants to live like those two others. But if the kingdom we both share in common gives you pleasure, then make that goddess and her uncle one.

Venus spoke. Cupid opened his quiver, as his mother had instructed, and picked
a single arrow from the thousand there.
None of the other arrows was as sharp and accurate, or truer to the bow.
He bent the supple tips against his knee,
and his barbed arrow struck Dis in the heart.

Not far from Henna’s walls lies a deep lake named Pergus. Music from its swans matches songs Caýster hears on his gliding stream.
A wood surrounds the lake, enclosing it on every side. Its leaves act as a shield and ward off rays from Phoebus, the branches cool the place, and the moist earth produces purple flowers. By that pool the season is an eternal spring. While Proserpine was playing in this wood, picking violets and shining lilies, and, like a young girl, was keen to fill her baskets and her lap, trying to gather more than anyone of her own age, Pluto caught sight of her and, in almost the same instant, loved her and carried her away—that’s how rapid

---

1Ceres is a daughter of Saturn and a sister of Jupiter and Pluto (who is thus uncle to Ceres’ daughter). The child of Ceres is Proserpine (also called Persephone) whose father is Jupiter. Proserpine is usually pronounced with three syllables (i.e., no final –e).
2Henna is a city in the middle of Sicily. Caýstros is a river in Lydia, famous for its swans.
love can be. The frightened goddess shouted cries of grief to her mother and her friends, mostly to her mother. She tore her robe along its upper edge, and the flowers she had gathered fell from her loosened clothes. Prosperine was so innocent and young, that this loss also brought out virgin tears. Her abductor drove the chariot ahead, urging on his horses, calling each of them by name, shaking his dark, rust-coloured reins over their manes and necks, and charging on through deep lakes and stinking sulphurous pools of the Palici, which come boiling up from a fissure in the earth, past the place where the Bacchiadæ, those people born in Corinth, beside two seas, had laid out their city with two very different harbours.1

Halfway between Pisaean Arethusa and Cyane there is an enclosed bay shut in by narrow headlands. Here there lived the most famous nymph in all of Sicily, Cyane. From her that stretch of water took its name. In the middle of the pool she rose and showed herself down to the waist, and, recognizing who the goddess was, called out to Dis:

‘You will go no further! You cannot be son-in-law to Ceres against her will. You should have asked the girl, not carried her away. If I may compare small things with great, I, too, had a lover, Anapis, and married him. But he won me with his entreaties. I was not frightened into marriage, like this girl.’

Cyane spoke.

Then she held out her arms on either side

---

1The Palici, two brothers born to Jupiter, were hidden in the earth (to escape Juno). They emerged in Sicily and were worshipped as gods associated with two sulphurous lakes there. The Bacchiadæ, a family exiled from Corinth, founded Syracuse in Sicily. The city had two harbours of different sizes. Corinth is on the narrow isthmus linking the Peloponnese and mainland Greece, between the Gulf of Corinth (part of the Ionian Sea) to the west and the Saronic Gulf (part of the Aegean Sea) to the east (hence “beside two seas”).
to block his way. Pluto could scarcely hold his rage. He drove his dreaded horses on, and his strong arm hurled his royal sceptre, which sank down to the bottom of the pool. Stuck by the blow, Earth opened up a path to Tartarus. The chariot hurtled down right through the middle of the gaping hole.

But Cyane, mourning the abduction of the goddess and the disrespect shown for the rights of her own waters, carries in her silent heart a wound and cannot be consoled. She pines away completely and melts into those streams where earlier she has been a potent holy presence. You can see her arms and legs get softer, bones grow flexible, nails lose their hardness. First, from her whole body the slenderest parts dissolve—her dark hair, fingers, legs, and feet (for it is no great change to turn thin limbs to chilly waters). Then her shoulders, back, sides, and chest all vanish, flowing away in light amorphous streams. And finally, in her collapsing veins pure water moves instead of living blood. Nothing remains which you can grasp.

Meanwhile, the girl’s mother, Ceres, fearing for her daughter, searches every land and every sea. When the dawn, Aurora, with her dew-drenched hair, arises or Hesperus, the Evening Star, appears, they do not find her resting. Her two hands hold flaming torches she has lit from fires on Aetna. In her frantic state of mind, she bears these through the darkness of the night, and when kind daylight once more dims the stars, from the time Sun rises until he sets, she continues searching for her daughter. Her constant effort made her tired and thirsty, for she had not wet her lips at any spring. Then, she caught sight, by chance, of a small hut with a roof of straw. She knocked at its low door. An older woman answered. When she saw the goddess and Ceres had requested a drink of water, the woman gave her something sweet. She had made it earlier from roasted barley grain. While Ceres sipped what she’d been offered, a rude, bold-faced boy walked up and, in a mocking voice, called her a greedy woman. Ceres was annoyed, and, as the boy was talking, threw the drink made from barley, what was still left of it, right in his face. His skin soaked up the drink and then grew spotted. Where his arms had been,
just a moment before, he now had legs.
A tail was added to his altered limbs,
and his form shrunk down to something tiny,
the size of a small lizard, even less,
without the strength to injure anyone.
The old woman, astonished and in tears,
tried to touch the monster, but it ran off, seeking a place to hide. Now it carries a name—the speckled lizard—which well suits its debased character and shrunken body, covered with various spots.

To list those lands
and waters where goddess Ceres wandered would take too long. She searched the entire world in vain and then returned to Sicily.
She crossed that island, looking everywhere, and reached Cyane, who would have told her
the whole story, if she had not been changed.
She wanted to, but lacked a mouth and tongue.
She had no organs she could use for speech.
But still, she did provide clear evidence the mother recognized, by displaying on the surface of her waters the belt Proserpine had worn. It had fallen off, by accident, into the sacred pool.
As soon as Ceres saw the belt, she tore her unkempt hair, her hands beat on her chest, again and again, as if at last she knew her daughter had been carried off. As yet, she did not know where Proserpine might be,
but she condemned all lands, accusing them
of being ungrateful and unworthy to receive her gift of grain—above all, Sicily, where she had found the traces of her loss. And therefore on that island her cruel hands break ploughs that turn the soil, and, in her rage, Ceres condemns to death farmers and cattle working in the fields, a similar fate for both. She orders fields to make the harvest crop a failure. She spoils the seed. That land’s fertility, so famous far and wide throughout the world, is finished, merely a made-up story. Crops are laid waste once their first shoots emerge. Sometimes excessive sunlight ruins them, sometimes too much rain. Weather and windstorms harm them, and hungry birds collect the seeds scattered here and there. Thorns, thistles, and grass which no one can control choke off the grain.

Then from her pool, Arethusa of Elis, the nymph Alpheus loved, raised up her head, brushed back the hair dripping on her forehead, and said to Ceres:

"Mother of our food and of that virgin girl you’re searching for throughout the entire world, you should give up this endless effort and, though you’re angry, suspend that rage against your faithful land. Earth has done nothing to deserve your rage. She opened to that rape against her will. I am not praying for my own country. I came here a stranger. My native land is Pisa, and I was born in Elis. But this soil is pleasing to me, more so than any other place. This is my home. This is where I live. Most gentle goddess, preserve it. Why I abandoned Elis, then moved through such a huge expanse of sea and reached Ortygia—I will find a time more suitable to recount my story," 1Alpheus is a major river in the Peloponnese.

---

2Pisa is a town in Elis, in the western Peloponnese.
when you are free of worries and your face has a more cheerful look. But I came here when cracked Earth opened up a way for me. I was borne far below its deepest caves, and it was here where I first raised my head and glimpsed the unfamiliar stars. Down there, while I was gliding on the Stygian stream below the earth, with my own eyes I saw Proserpine, your daughter. She was grieving, that is true, and her face showed signs of fear, but nonetheless, in that world of shadows, she was queen, the most important woman, the powerful consort of that tyrant who rules the Underworld!

When she heard this, Ceres was stunned, as if turned into stone, and for a long time seemed to be in shock, until her intense anguish pushed aside the weight of her bewilderment. She rushed in her chariot up to heaven, and there, face clouded in sorrow, hair dishevelled, she stood in front of Jupiter and spoke in a bitter voice:

'I have come to you, Jupiter, to plead for my own offspring and for yours, as well. If the child’s mother finds no favour with you, let the daughter influence her father and, I beg you, do not let your care for her be any less because she was born from me. Lo, my child has been found, the one I have been seeking for so long, if you can call it finding when one is still more certain she’s been lost, if you call it finding when all one knows is where she is. I can accept the fact that she has been abducted, provided he returns her. A man who steals and rapes, is no fit husband for a child of yours, even if the girl were not my daughter.’

Jupiter replied:

‘That child is our pledge,
our shared responsibility, yours and mine.
But if you wish to give accurate names to things, this is not a criminal act.
The truth is that this is love. And Pluto would not be a son-in-law who shames us, if you, goddess, would give him your consent.
If Pluto lacked all other qualities,
  he would still be great—he is Jove’s brother!
What if he did not lack my qualities and were not inferior to me at all, except for the lot he drew?
However,
if your desire that those two separate is so strong, Prosperine may come back here to heaven, but on one fixed condition—
  her lips have not touched any food down there, for this has been established by the Fates
  in their decrees.’

Jupiter had spoken.
Ceres was resolved to save her daughter.
But Fate would not allow it, for the girl had broken her fast. In her innocence, while she was in the cultivated garden, wandering round, she had picked purple fruit from a bent-over pomegranate tree, taken seven seeds from its yellow rind
  and pressed them in her mouth.
Of all those there,
only one observed her, Ascalaphus,
who, so people say, was born to Orphne,
not the least-known of the Avernian nymphs,

1Jove is another name for Jupiter.
2This is a reference to the previously mentioned lottery which assigned Jupiter the sky, Neptune the sea, and Pluto the Underworld. Jupiter’s point is that he is superior to Pluto only because he was lucky and chance favoured him.
3Ovid’s text does not state specifically that the fruit is from a pomegranate tree, but long-standing traditions and rituals associated with Ceres for centuries identified the “purple fruit” as a pomegranate. The number of seeds varies from one account to another.
and her own Acheron, in the dark woods.¹
He saw her, revealed that she had eaten, and cruelly prevented her return.
The queen of Erebus, in her dismay, transformed the one who had informed on her to an ill-omened bird. Sprinkling his head with Phlegethon’s waters, she changes it into a beak, feathers, and enormous eyes.²
With his own shape removed, he is wrapped up in tawny wings, and his head grows larger.
He finds his nails bent into long talons and can hardly move the feathers growing on his sluggish arms. He has now become a lazy screech owl, that hated bird, which brings news of approaching grief for mortal men, a fateful omen.

Now Ascalaphus
would seem to have deserved his punishment
by telling what he saw, but as for you, daughters of Acheloüs, why do you have feet and feathers of a bird, while still possessing faces of young virgin girls?
The reason is that you sweet-singing Sirens were there with Proserpine’s companions when she was collecting her spring flowers?³ After you had searched the whole world for her and had no success, you began to wish that you had beating wings to make your way above the ocean waves, so they could learn of your anxiety. You found out the gods agreed, and suddenly you saw your limbs were growing yellow feathers. However, to make sure your songs, born to charm the ear,
and your great vocal gifts would not be lost if your tongues disappeared, your virgin faces and human voice remained.

¹Avernus is a poisonous lake in Italy, where, people claimed, birds never flew. It was believed to be near the Underworld. Acheron is one of the main rivers of the underworld.
²Erebus is the deepest pit of the underworld. The queen of Erebus is now Proserpine, consort of Pluto. Phlegethon is one of the rivers of the underworld.
³The Sirens are the daughter of the river Acheloüs and one of the Muses.
But Jupiter, to mediate between his grieving sister and his brother, divides revolving years in equal portions. So now the goddess, Persephone, is common to both realms. The months she spends with Ceres up above match those she spends with Pluto down below. Her face and nature change immediately. For now the way she looks, which seemed so sad a moment ago, that even Dis himself would notice it, is joyful, like the sun, which, hidden earlier by clouds of rain, conquers those clouds and breaks away from them.

Nourishing Ceres, happy that her child had come back safely, asked Arethusa why she ran away and why she was now a sacred spring. The waters grew silent, as Arethusa lifted her head up from the deep pool and her hands wrung water out of her green hair. Then she spoke of love, an old tale of the Elean river.

‘I was a nymph, one of a company inhabiting Achaea. None of them was more eager to roam the forest glades, none was keener to set our hunting nets. Though I was spirited and never tried to become admired for my appearance, I was called beautiful. But my good looks, so often praised, were no great joy to me. Those physical gifts which other young girls usually delight in made me turn red, like a country simpleton, and I thought it wicked to win praises just for that. I remember I was on my way back from the Stymphalian woods and very tired. It was hot, and hard work had made the heat just that much worse. But then I reached a stream flowing without a ripple or a sound.

---

1 Persephone is the Greek name for Proserpine. As queen of the Underworld, she is usually called Persephone.
2 Stymphalus is a city and a region in Arcadia.
You could see right to the bottom and count each small stone in the depths. You would have thought it hardly moved at all. Silver willows and poplar trees, nourished by its waters, provided, all on their own, natural shadows on its sloping banks. I approached the stream and, to start with, put my feet in, and then my legs up to the knees. Not content with that, I undressed, took my soft clothes and hung them in a curving willow, and, quite naked, jumped in the stream. While I struck the water and drew it to me, gliding around there in a thousand ways, pushing out my arms and stretching them, I heard a kind of noise, a murmur in the middle of the stream underneath the surface. I was afraid and leapt out on the nearest river bank.

‘Where are you running to, Arethusa?’

It was Alpheus calling from his stream. He spoke to me again in a harsh voice: [600]

‘Why move off so quickly?’

I ran away just as I was, not wearing any clothes. I’d left them on the other riverbank. He was all the keener to chase me down. He was on fire, and, since I was naked, I seemed to him much easier to win. So I fled, and he pursued me wildly, as doves with trembling wings fly from a hawk, and as a hawk will chase a trembling dove. All the way past Orchomenus, Psophis, and Mount Cyllene I kept on running, past the ridges of Maenalus, then past cold Erymanthus and Elis.¹ Alpheus could not outrun me, but my endurance did not match his. I could not keep moving at that pace for long, but he was able to continue a long and tiring chase.

¹The place names refer to locations in Arcadia.
Still, I raced on through fields, over mountains covered in trees, over rocks, too, and crags, and through places where there was no pathway. The sun was at my back. I saw long shadows stretched out before my feet, unless my fear imagined them, but I was truly scared of the sound made by his feet. The deep breaths coming from his panting mouth stirred ribbons in my hair. Exhausted by the effort of trying to run away, I cried:

‘Help me!
I will be captured! Diana, please help your armour bearer, whom you often gave your bow to carry and your quiver, too, with all its arrows!’

The goddess was moved. She took a thick cloud and threw it round me. I was shielded by the dark. Alpheus, the river god, moved around me, searching, in his confusion, through the hollow fog. Without being aware of it, he walked twice right past where the goddess had concealed me, and twice he called out:

‘O Arethusa!
Arethusa!’

What was I feeling then, in such desperate straits? What a lamb feels, perhaps, when it listens to howling wolves around the high sheep fold, or when a hare hidden in a thicket sees the muzzles of the ravenous dogs and does not dare make a single movement with its body. But he did not leave, for he could not see any further traces of my footprints. He kept watching the place, eyeing the cloud. Cold sweat covered my trapped limbs, and dark drops fell from my whole body. When my foot moved, a pool collected there, moisture dripped down from my hair, and faster than I can now tell you the tale, I changed into a stream.
BOOK FIVE

But then the river god could recognize the water that he loved. Casting aside the human shape he had assumed, he switched to his own liquid form so he might mix himself with me. But the Delian goddess, Diana, split the ground apart. I plunged through hidden caverns and reached Ortygia. This place delights me, for it bears the name of my own goddess.' Here I first emerged into the upper air.'

Arethusa

finished her story here. And so Ceres, goddess of the fertile fields, then harnessed two dragons to her chariot, curbed their mouths with bits, and moved off, through the middle air, between the earth and heaven. When she reached Tritonia’s city, Athens, she handed her light chariot over to Triptolemus. She gave him seed and then instructed him to scatter it, some on untilled soil, some on lands which, after a long period of lying fallow, were being restored. The youth was carried high above the lands of Europe and of Asia, and then turned towards the realm of Scythia, a place where Lyncus ruled. There Triptolemus went into the royal palace and stood before the king’s own household gods. When asked where he had come from, why he had come there, what his name and country were, he answered:

‘My native country is famous Athens, my name Triptolemus. I did not come by ship across the seas or overland on foot. For me the unobstructed sky opened a road. I bring gifts from Ceres. If you will scatter these on your wide fields, they will give back bountiful harvest crops of nourishing food.’

‘Ortygia, as well as being the name of an island off Syracuse, is also another name for the island of Delos, where Diana was born (hence, she is sometimes called “the Delian goddess”).

'Triptolemus is a son of Celeus, king of Eleusis.'
The barbarian king, Lyncus, was jealous. Wishing to make himself bringer of such a noble gift, he welcomed Triptolemus as a guest, but then at night, when he was sleeping soundly, attacked him with a sword. As he tried to stab his chest, Ceres changed Lyncus to a lynx and told the Athenian youth to keep on moving in her sacred chariot through the air.’

Here Calliope, our finest singer, ended her song, and the nymphs, with one voice, declared the goddesses who inhabited Mount Helicon the winners. Those sisters, who had lost the contest, yelled out abuse, so I remarked:

‘Since you all well deserve a punishment for your challenge to us and now to that offense you add these insults, and since our patience is not limitless, we will move to sentence you, following where our anger leads.’

The Emathian sisters laughed and ridiculed our threatening words. But as they tried to speak and menace us by screaming and by brandishing their fists, they saw feathers growing from their nails and plumage covering their arms. They looked at one another and saw their faces harden into rigid beaks and new birds being added to the woods. And when they tried to beat their breasts in grief, their moving arms lifted them up. They hovered in the air, as magpies, the gossipers in the trees. Even now, as birds, that love of talking they had before remains, their harsh chatter and their inordinate desire to speak.”

---

1Here Calliope’s story, which begins at 5.543 ends. The speaker is still Urania, who begins her story describing the contest between the Muses and the daughters of Pierus at 5.537.
BOOK VI

[Minerva hears about Arachne and responds to her challenge; Minerva’s weaves scenes of herself and Neptune competing for Athens; Arachne’s weaves scenes of divine sexual assaults; Minerva turns Arachne into a spider; Niobe boasts she is better than Latona; Niobe’s sons are killed; Niobe’s husband commits suicide; Niobe’s daughters are killed; Niobe is turned to stone; the story of Latona and the Lycian peasants; Apollo flays Marsyas; Pelops’s ivory shoulder; Procne and Tereus; Tereus and Philomela; Tereus rapes and mutilates Philomela; Philomela informs Procne; Procne rescues Philomela; Procne and Philomela kill Itys and serve him as food to his father; Procne, Philomela, and Tereus are changed into birds; Boreas and Orithyia; Calais and Zethes.]

When Minerva had listened to these tales from the Aonian Muses, she commended their singing and their justified resentment. Then she told herself:

“To praise someone else is not enough. Let me be praised, as well, and not allow my presence to be scorned without some punishment.”

She turned her mind to the fortunes of a Maeonian girl, Arachne, who, she heard, was being praised as much as she was for her artistry in spinning wool. It was not lofty rank or family origins which had made Arachne so well known. It was her skill. Her father Idmon, who came from Colophon, coloured absorbent wool with purple dye from Phocaean shell fish. Her mother was dead, but she, too, was produced from common stock, and her husband was the same. Nonetheless, although Arachne’s home was very small and she lived in a tiny town, Hypaepae, she had acquired a splendid reputation throughout the Lydian cities. Often nymphs would abandon their vine-covered slopes on Tmolus mountain or leave their waters

---

1Maeonia is a region in Lydia, in Asia Minor.
2Colophon is a city in Lydia, Phocaea a coastal city in Asia Minor, famous for its dye.
3Hypaepae is a small town in Lydia.
on the Pactolus river, to inspect Arachne's astonishing workmanship.
They loved to see, not just the finished clothes,
but also the way they were created.
She added so much beauty to her skill, whether she began by winding rough yarn into new balls of wool or was working the fibres with her fingers, softening fleecy clouds of wool over and over, drawing them out in one long equal thread,
or was using her dexterous thumb to turn her slender spindle, or embroidering with her needle. You could easily see she had been taught by Pallas. But she claimed that was not the case. She was offended with the notion she had had a teacher, even such a great one, and she remarked:

“Let Pallas compete with me. If I lose,
I don’t care what she does.”

So Pallas changed
into an old woman, adding white hair
to her temples, giving herself weak limbs, and holding up her body with a stick.
Then she began speaking to Arachne,
with these words:

“We ought not to run away from all the things which accompany old age.
Advancing years bring us experience.
Do not spurn what I advise. Seek your fame as the greatest woman working with wool among all mortal beings, but give first place to the goddess, and, you rash girl, ask her in a humble voice to grant forgiveness for the things you said. She will pardon you, if you ask her.”

With a scowl, Arachne glared at the old woman. She left the weaving she had started. Her face was very angry, and she could hardly keep her hands in check.
She said the following words to Pallas (who was still disguised):

“You have come in here worn out by extreme old age, with a mind which is now feeble. You have lived too long—that’s your trouble. Let your daughter-in-law or daughter, if you have one, pay attention to what you have to say. What I believe is good enough for me. So don’t assume that your advice has any influence.
My views remain the same. As for the goddess, why can’t she show up in person? Why shirk my challenge?”

Then, throwing off her disguise
as the old woman, Minerva cries out:

“She has come!”

And Pallas reveals herself.
The nymphs and women of Mygdonia treat her divinity with reverent awe.
Arachne is the only one who stands there unafraid.1 However, she does turn red.
Against her will a sudden blush appears across her face and goes away again, just as the sky usually grows crimson when Aurora begins to move, and then,
a short time later, once the sun moves up, turns white. She insists on going ahead with what she started, and, eager to win a foolish prize, she rushes to her fate.
For Jupiter’s daughter does not back down, or warn her any further, or postpone the contest. They waste no time, but set up their positions in two different places, stretch slender threads along the looms, attach the frame and crossbeam, then with a heddle separate the woolen fibres in the warp, interweave the cross-threads in the middle with pointed shuttles their fingers have prepared,

---

1Mygdonia is a region in Asia Minor near Lydia.
and, after they have pulled thread through the warp, press it in place with blows from a notched comb marked with rows of teeth. They both work quickly, tucking their garments underneath their breasts, so their skilled arms can move with greater speed. They are so keen to work, they feel as if it is not work at all. Sometimes, they weave with purple threads dyed in Tyrian vats, subtly different shades, hard to tell apart, just as, after a shower, a rainbow, when its enormous arc is struck by sunlight, will often tint a large expanse of sky, and a thousand different colours shine there, yet when one looks at it, one cannot see transitions from one shade to another, so much so that bands which are adjacent all look the same, but yet the outer bands are very different. In other places they also weave in pliant threads of gold.

Each tapestry depicts an ancient story. Minerva’s scene portrays the rock of Mars on the citadel of Cecrops’ city and the old argument about what name the country should be called. Twelve gods sit there, on lofty thrones in solemn majesty, with Jupiter in the middle. She shows each god with his own particular face. Jupiter’s image has royal presence, and she pictures Neptune, god of the sea, standing there, as well, striking a rough stone with his long trident, and from that boulder the sea is pouring through an open crack, the token by which he claims the city. For herself she provides a shield and spear

---

1 In weaving, the warp is the series of parallel threads (in most traditional looms these are vertical) held apart under tension by a device called the heddle. The shuttle contains the wool which the weaver moves between the threads of the warp. When a line of thread from the shuttle has been passed through all the individual threads of the warp, it is pushed down against the already woven material with a comb, to make the finished product thick.

2 Cecrops was a traditional king of Athens. Minerva and Neptune each laid claim to the new city. To resolve their quarrel they were each invited to give one gift to the city, and Cecrops would choose a winner. Neptune provided water, but it was salty sea water, and Minerva provided the olive tree. Cecrops chose Minerva as winner.
with a pointed tip. On top of her head she puts a helmet. The aegis guards her chest.
She also shows the earth struck by her spear growing a pale olive shoot with berries, while gods look on amazed. Her final touch completes the work, the form of Victory.
But then, so that her rival for great praise may from her illustrations understand what sort of prize she can look forward to for her extremely rash audacity, Minerva includes four scenes of contests,
one in each of the four corners, showing figures in brightly coloured miniature.
One corner depicts Rhodope from Thrace and Haemus, who once had mortal bodies, but are cold mountains now. They gave themselves names of the most important gods above.¹ Another corner shows the wretched fate of the Pygmy queen, whom Juno conquered in a contest, then turned into a crane and ordered to wage war on her own race.²
And she pictures Antigone, who once dared challenge the wife of mighty Jupiter.
Queen Juno had her changed into a bird,
and neither her father, Laomedon,
nor her city, Ilion, were any help.
She turned into a stork, growing white wings,
and with a chattering beak gives herself incessant praise.³ The only corner left shows Cinyras when he lost his children.
He is seen shedding tears, lying on stone, embracing temple steps that used to be his daughters' limbs.⁴ Around the outer edge, Minerva then puts olives, signs of peace.

¹Rhodope, daughter of the river god Strymon, married Haemus, son of the North Wind. They dedicated a cult to themselves and called themselves Zeus and Hera.
²The queen of the Pygmies scorned the traditional gods and, as a result, was changed into a bird, the crane.
People claimed cranes regularly attacked the Pygmies, who were small people living to the east or north of Greece.
³Antigone, daughter of Laomedon of Troy, claimed she was more beautiful than Juno.
⁴Cinyras was a king of Assyria. His daughters were changed into temple steps because they claimed they were lovelier than Juno. Cinyras himself was transformed to stone as he lay at the temple grieving their loss.
Her work is now complete. With her own tree she finishes off and ends her weaving.

Arachne weaves an image of Europa, when Jupiter, transformed into a bull, abducted her.¹ You could well imagine the bull was real, the sea waves genuine. Europa is depicted looking back at the land now left behind, calling out to her companions, afraid of contact with the surging waters, and pulling up her timid feet. She shows Asterie in the struggling eagle’s grip, and pictures Leda lying prone underneath the swan. She then adds scenes of Jupiter disguised—first as a satyr, when he filled the womb of beautiful Antiope with twins, then as Amphitryon, when he took you, Alcmene, a girl from Tiryns, and then when he tricked Danaë as a shower of gold, Aegina, child of Asopus, as a flame, Mnemosyne as a shepherd, and Deois as a speckled serpent.² She also pictures you, Neptune, transformed to a young bull, when you desired to mate with Aeolus’ virgin daughter Canace. Looking like the river Enipeus, you fathered twin sons, the Aloïdae, while, as a ram, you tricked Theophane, daughter of Bisaltus, and as a horse, you had sex with the gentlest of them all, golden-haired Ceres, mother of our crops. The snake-haired mother of the flying horse knew you as a bird, and for Melantho you assumed a dolphin’s form. Arachne pictures all of these, giving each image appropriate faces and locations. Phoebus is there, in a scene showing him in rustic clothing. She weaves how he wore, on one occasion, a hawk’s wings, but then, on another, a lion’s skin, and how in his shepherd’s clothes he misled Issa, Macareus’ daughter. She includes how Bacchus tricked Erigone, using a false bunch of grapes, and then how Saturn turned himself into a horse and fathered Chiron, who was half horse, half mortal man.\(^1\) The outer part of the design, surrounded by a narrow border, has woven flowers intertwined with clustering strands of ivy.

¹For Ovid’s story about Europa and Jupiter see 2.1236 ff above.
²Asterië was a sister of Latona. Jupiter’s deceptions and forcible abductions for sex produced a number of famous children (for example, Leda, whom Jupiter assaulted in the form of a swan, was the mother of Helen of Troy, Alcmene the mother of Hercules, Mnemosyne of the nine Muses, and Danaë of Perseus). Deois is another name for Proserpine, daughter of Ceres and Jupiter (i.e., the assault is also father-daughter incest).

Neither Envy nor Minerva could fault Arachne’s work. Enraged by her success, the goddess with the yellow hair ripped up the woven scenes of those criminal acts committed by the gods, held up her shuttle (it was made of boxwood from Cytorus), and battered Arachne, Idmon’s daughter, three or four times across her head.\(^2\) The girl, now desperate, could not endure the blows, and, in a burst of courage, fixed a noose around her neck. As she was dangling there, Pallas took pity, lifted her up, and said:

“You may go on living, insolent girl, but you must hang suspended. To make sure you do not grow negligent in future, let the same decree which punishes you be pronounced as well against your family, the entire line of your posterity.”

After that, as she was leaving, Pallas sprinkled Arachne with a potion made

\(^1\)In the form of the river Enipeus, Neptune forced sex on Iphimedeia, who had two sons, the Giants Otus and Ephialtes. As a ram, Neptune had sex with Theophane (changed into a sheep), who gave birth to the ram with the Golden Fleece. The mother of the winged horse was Medusa, but Pegasus was born from her blood, not from Neptune’s seed. Melantho was (in some accounts) the daughter of Deucalion. Erigone was the daughter of Icarius, a follower of Bacchus. Bacchus deceived Erigone by disguising himself as a cluster of grapes. Chiron’s mother was Phillyra.

\(^2\)Cytorus is a mountain on the southern shores of the Black Sea, famous for its boxwood.
from Hecate’s herbs. Touched by this harsh drug, her hair fell out at once, her nose and ears were also gone, her head grew very small, her whole form shrivelled to a tiny shape, her slender fingers stuck to her sides as legs, and the rest of her was belly. And yet, she sent out a fibre from that belly and, as a spider, continued weaving, the way she used to do in earlier days.

All Lydia was upset by these events. News of what had happened travelled around through towns in Phrygia, and the wide world was full of people spreading the report. Niobe, before her marriage, had known Arachne. She had been a young girl then, living in Maeonia and Sipylus, but though she came from the same native land, she did not take Arachne’s punishment as a warning she should give precedence to gods above and speak more modestly. Many factors made her proud, but it was not her husband’s skill, or the fine ancestry they both shared, or their powerful kingdom that gave her a sense of satisfaction (although she was delighted with them all) so much as her own children. And people would have called Niobe the happiest of mothers, if she had not also held that view herself.

Now, Teiresias’ daughter, Manto, who could see into the future, moved by an impulse from the gods, wandered through the middle of the city crying out in prophecy:

“You women of Thebes, crown your hair with laurel, and go, all of you

---

1Hecate is the divine daughter of the original gods Gaia and Ouranos. She is associated with magic, witchcraft, and childbearing.
2Sipylus is a city and a mountain in Lydia.
3Niobe’s husband is Amphion, a wonderfully skilled musician. They were king and queen of Thebes.
in one large gathering, and offer incense and holy prayers honouring Latona and her children, Apollo and Diana.
Through these lips of mine, Latona is now proclaiming her commands.”

All Theban women
do what the goddess has announced. They wreathe their heads with laurel, as she has ordered,
and offer incense and words of prayer to the sacred flames. Then, lo and behold, Niobe arrives—and with her a crowd,
an enormous throng, of her attendants.
She is a splendid sight in Phrygian clothing interwoven with gold, as beautiful as her anger will allow. She stands there, tossing her lovely head, shaking the hair along both shoulders. With a haughty gaze, her proud eyes sweep around her, and she says:

“What madness it is to prefer the gods in heaven, whom you only hear about, over those that you can see. Why worship Latona at these altars built for her,
when my divinity still lacks incense?
Tantalus was my father, the only man allowed to touch the tables of the gods.
My mother is sister to the Pleiades, and her father is the mighty Atlas,
on whose shoulders rests the weight of heaven.¹
My other grandfather is Jupiter, and I can also boast about the fact he is my father-in-law.² In Phrygia people fear me. I rule the royal house of Cadmus. My husband’s power and mine govern the people and the walls of Thebes,

¹Tantalus, a son of Zeus, was a king in Lydia. He stole from the gods and offered up his son Pelops for them to eat. As a result, he was condemned to the underworld (for Ovid’s mention of him there see 4.578).
Niobe’s mother, in some accounts, was Taygete, one of the Pleiades (daughters of Atlas, who were set in the sky as stars in a constellation).
²Jupiter is the father of Niobe’s husband, Amphion.
built by the music of my husband’s lyre.\(^1\)
Wherever I turn my eyes inside my home I see enormous wealth. Then add to that my beauty, which is worthy of a goddess.
Include with this my children—seven sons and just as many daughters, and soon sons-in-law and daughters-in-law, as well!
Now ask if I have reason to be proud,
and then have the presumption to prefer Latona over me. Why, she was born to Titan Coeus (whoever he is),
and the great Earth once refused to give her a tiny scrap of ground where she could lie and give birth to her children. Your goddess was not welcome in heaven or on earth or in the sea. She was exiled from the world, until Delos felt some pity for her,
as she wandered here and there, and gave her an unstable resting place. He told her:

‘You roam the earth a stranger, the same way
I move around the sea.’

There she became the mother of two children.\(^2\) But I have seven times that number, all born from me.
I am fortunate (who can deny it?),
and my good fortune will remain with me.
Can anyone doubt that? Prosperity has made me safe. Fortune cannot harm me—I am too great. Though she could take away many things from me, she would still leave us a great deal more. The fine things I possess outweigh whatever I may have to fear.
Suppose some of my numerous children could be removed from me. I would be sad, but I would not be left with just those two Latona has. With a family that size,

\(^1\)Amphion and his twin brother Zethos, sons of Lycos, built the walls of Thebes. Zethos had to work manually, but Amphion’s musical skill was so great that when he played the rocks moved on their own and set themselves in place.

\(^2\)Because of the anger of Juno, pregnant Latona could find no place to give birth, until Delos, a wandering island, offered her space. There Latona gave birth to Apollo and Diana. As a result, the island became fixed in place. Apollo and Diana are often called the Delian gods.
how far is she from having none at all?
Go home! Enough of holy sacrifice!
And get those laurel wreaths out of your hair.”

The women remove the laurel wreaths and leave, without finishing the ritual sacrifice, except by worshipping the deity with silent murmuring, as is their right.

Latona was outraged. On the summit of Mount Cynthus she spoke to her two twins, Diana and Apollo, with these words:

“Look, children, I am your mother and proud to have produced you. There is no goddess, except for Juno, whom I defer to.
But unless you help me, people will doubt I am divine and will drive me away from those altars consecrated to me for all ages yet to come. This is not my only grief. Tantalus’s daughter has added insults to her profane acts, by daring to proclaim her family outranks you both and to assert that I am childless. May that claim of hers rebound on her own head! It is quite clear her tongue is every bit as nasty as her father’s.”

To what she had already said, Latona was going to add her own entreaties, but Apollo cried:

“Stop! A long complaint merely delays her punishment!”

Diana said the same. So the two of them, hidden by the clouds, swooped down through the air and reached the royal citadel of Thebes.

---

1 Mount Cynthus is on the island of Delos.
2 Tantalus was a notorious deceiver and liar, even to the gods.
Near the walls
there is a wide expanse of level ground always used for horses. These animals have trampled down the earth, and many wheels and solid hooves have softened up the turf.
Some of Amphion’s seven sons are there, mounted on spirited horses, sitting firmly on their backs, all dressed in garments of Tyrian purple and holding reins weighted down with gold. Among those riders, Ismenus, first of all the children born from Niobe’s womb, while guiding his horse through a perfect circle and pulling back on the foaming bit, screams out:

“I’ve been hit!”

In the centre of his chest an arrow is sticking out. His dying hands let go the reins, and he gradually falls sideways, over the right shoulder of his horse. Next, Sipylus, who is right beside him, hears sounds from a quiver through the empty air.
He gives his horse free rein, just as a helmsman, sensing an impending storm, scurries off,
once he sees the clouds, and hoists up all his sails,
so as not to lose the slightest breath of air.
Though Sipylus has let the reins go slack,
he is caught by an unerring arrow,
and the quivering shaft sticks in his neck,
at the top, while from his throat protrudes the naked iron tip. Leaning forward where he is, he falls on his horse’s mane, rolls through the racing hooves, and stains the ground with his warm blood. Unlucky Phaedimus and Tantalus (who has inherited his grandfather’s name), once they are finished their usual training, move to wrestling,
a young man’s sport, and, glistening with oil,
are now entangled in a hold, grappling chest against chest. Then an arrow, speeding from a taut bowstring, pierces both of them, as they are locked together. They both groan and fall together, both at once, their limbs convulsed with pain. The two of them lie there, gaze at the sunlight for the final time, and in one breath both brothers breathe their last. Alphenor sees them there. Beating his breast and tearing at his skin, he rushes up, to lift their icy limbs up in his arms. While he is doing this pious duty, he, too, is killed, for the Delian god strikes him with a deadly iron arrow deep in his diaphragm, and once the shaft is pulled out from his flesh, part of his lung is drawn out with the barbs. His blood and life escape into the open air together. But long-haired Damasicthon is not struck by just one wound. He is hit in the leg, where the shin begins and sinews of the knee have a soft spot in between. While he tries to pull the lethal arrow out by hand, another drives itself into his throat, up to the feathers. Flowing blood forces the arrow out and gushes up in spurts, piercing the air, shooting in a high arc a long, long way. Then Ilioneus, the only son remaining, lifts his arms in a vain gesture of supplication, and cries:

"O, all you company of gods, spare me!"

He said this, for he did not know there was no need to ask them all. Apollo, the archer god, was moved, but at that point the weapon could not be recalled. However, the young lad died from the tiniest of wounds, for the arrow was not driven all that far inside his heart.

News of this disaster, popular grief, and her own family’s tears confirmed for Niobe what had gone on in this sudden catastrophe. Amazed they could have done it, she became enraged that the gods above had so much power and had dared to use it. For Amphion, the father, had driven an iron sword into his chest, and, by dying, ended in one blow both his sorrow and his life. Alas! How different this Niobe is from the Niobe who only recently forced her people from Latona’s altars and strolled through the middle of the city, proud head held high, envied by everyone. Now she is a woman to be pitied even by enemies. She collapses on the frigid bodies and randomly gives each one of her sons a final kiss. She turns from them and, raising her bruised arms up to the sky, cries:

“Eat your fill, Latona, of my sorrow. Cram your chest to bursting with my pain, and may these seven murders bring satisfaction to your savage heart! It’s over for me. Enjoy the triumph of the victor over her enemy! But how are you the winner? I may be wretched, but I still have more children left than you do, in spite of your good fortune. Even after so many sons have died, I still outnumber you!”

As Niobe spoke, a twang from a taut bowstring made a sound which filled all the people there with terror, except for Niobe—her wretchedness had made her rash.

The sisters, dressed in black hair loose across their shoulders, are standing by their brother’s corpses. Then an arrow strikes one in the stomach. She pulls it out and, as she is about to die, faints away and falls face down her brother’s body. Another sister trying to console her grieving mother suddenly goes limp and doubles over from some unseen wound. She clamps her mouth shut, but her living soul has left already. One tries to run away, but without success. She falls. Another crumples on her sister. One hides herself, and you can see one standing there, shaking. Six sisters are now dead from various wounds. One last one remains. With her whole body and her clothes, Niobe protects the girl, screaming:

“At least leave me one! The youngest! Just one out of so many! I beg you! My youngest!”

But while she is crying this, the child she is pleading for is slaughtered. Now she has no children. She sits down there, among her dead husband, sons, and daughters, rigid with grief. The breezes do not move her hair, the colour in her cheeks lacks blood, in her sad face the eyes stand motionless. There is no sign of life in her at all. Inwardly, as well, her tongue is frozen to her hardened palate. Her veins have lost their power to throb. She cannot bend her neck, or shift her arms, or move her feet around. Her inner organs, too, have turned to stone. And yet she weeps. Then a mighty whirlwind encircles her and carries her from there to her own land. Set on a mountain top, she wastes away, and, even now, the tears flow down her marble face.

All men and women truly fear the anger of that goddess, now it stands revealed. Every one of them pays more respect in ritual worship to the power of her divinity, the mother of the twins. As usual, given recent facts, people once again recount old stories. One of them begins:

“Long ago in Lycia’s fertile fields the peasants there also spurned the goddess and paid for it. Now, it’s true the story is not well known, because the men involved were common folk. Still, it is still amazing. Once I went past the place and saw the lake those miraculous events made famous. Since my father, who was getting older, could not make the trip, he instructed me to bring back from there some special cattle. As I was setting out, he offered me a guide, someone native to the region. Well, while this man and I were travelling across the fields, we saw an ancient altar, black with sacrificial ashes, standing in the middle of a lake, surrounded by quivering reeds. My guide stopped and said in a timid whisper:

‘Be kind to me.’

So I did the same and muttered:

‘Be kind.’

But when I asked him if the altar stood there in honour of the naiads, or Faunus, or some native god, the stranger gave me the following reply:¹

‘No, my lad, there is no mountain spirit in this altar here. The goddess who can call this place her own is the one the queen of heaven banished from the world and who was later rescued by roaming Delos, still a slight island floating in the sea. With great reluctance he welcomed her, in answer to her prayers. And on that island, Latona then gave birth to her twins, leaning up against a palm and an olive tree from Pallas, thwarting their stepmother’s wishes.² But people say that, even after she had given birth, she left this place, as well, fleeing Juno, ¹Faunus is the Roman god of the forest, equivalent to the Greek god Pan.

²The stepmother of the newly born twins is Juno, the wife of their father, Jupiter.
BOOK SIX

and holding her two children, both divine, against her breast. Then she crossed the border into Lycia, the Chimaera’s home, where the burning sun had scorched the pastures.¹

Weary from her lengthy struggles and parched by summer heat, Latona needed water (her famished children also had devoured all her breast milk). Then, she happened to see a smallish lake in a valley bottom, where country folk were gathering rushes, as well as bushy osiers and the sedge which flourished in those marshes. The goddess went up, bent her knees, knelt down on the ground, and tried to drink some of that cool water. But the crowd of peasants would not let her. They pulled her back. And so the goddess said:

‘Why deny me water? It is put there for common use. Nature has not made sun, air, or running water the property of individuals. I have come here to a place which benefits all people. And yet I ask you as a suppliant to let me use it. I am not going to bathe my body or my weary limbs here in the lake, but merely quench my thirst. Even as I speak, my mouth lacks moisture, and my jaws are dry. I can hardly find a channel for my voice to pass through them. A drink of water will be nectar to me, and, at the same time, it will save my life. That I will acknowledge—with the water you will offer me my life. Take pity on these children, too, here at my bosom, stretching out their tiny arms towards you.’

And, as it so happened, the infant twins are holding out their arms. Who can resist Latona’s moving plea? But those peasants, no matter what she says, keep her away and threaten her about what they will do ¹The Chimaera is a fabulous monster made up of three different animals (a lion’s head, a goat’s body, and a snake’s tail).

if she does not move further off, adding insults, too. That is not enough for them. With their hands and feet they stir up the lake, purely for spite, and jump around the pool, to churn up soft mud at the very bottom. The daughter of Coeus, in her fierce rage, forgets her thirst and now no longer tries to plead with such undeserving wretches. She can no longer bear to utter words demeaning to a goddess. With hands raised up to the sky, she cries:

‘Live forever in that pond of yours.’

The goddess’s wish has its effect. Those Lycian peasants are seized by an urge to leap in water. Sometimes they immerse their entire bodies in the deep parts of the lake and sometimes raise their heads or swim across the surface. Often they squat on banks beside the pool, and often hop back in the cooling water. But even now they use their filthy tongues to quarrel and without a sense of shame keep trying to shout out their abuse, even when they are swimming underwater. Their voices now are rough, their swollen necks inflated, and the insults they croak out make their wide mouths even wider. Their heads rest on their backs—it looks as if their necks have been removed. Their backs are coloured green, and their bodies’ largest part, the belly, is coloured white. And now, as new-made frogs, they hop around there in their muddy pool."

When the storyteller, whoever he was, had finished his account of the downfall of those men from Lycia, someone else remembered the story of that satyr, Marsyas, whom Latona’s son, Apollo, had defeated in a competition with a reed pipe, the instrument invented by Minerva, and on whom he later inflicted punishment. Marsyas cried:

“Why are you tearing parts of me away!”

And he kept screaming:

“Aiii! I’m sorry!
The flute is not worth this much agony!”

As his screams ring out, his skin is sliced off the surface of his limbs, and he becomes one huge wound, with blood flowing everywhere. His bare sinews lie exposed, and his veins quiver and throb with no skin over them. You can count his pulsing inner organs, and fibres of his lungs are clearly visible inside his chest. The woodland deities and the fauns living in the countryside weep for him, as do his brother satyrs (among them is Olympus, even then a dear friend of his), the nymphs, and all those who graze flocks of sheep or herds of cattle in those mountains. The fertile earth is drenched. The saturated soil takes in those tears, absorbing them into its deepest veins, and transforms them to a stream of water, which it sends out into the open air. From there it quickly flows down to the sea between steep riverbanks, the clearest stream in Phrygia, named after Marsyas.

Having heard these sorts of stories, people quickly turned back to present things and mourned the death of Amphion and his children. They blamed the mother, although even then one man, they say, shed tears for her, as well, her brother Pelops. Tearing his tunic

---

1 Minerva invented the reed pipe, but threw it away when she found out that playing the instrument made her cheeks bulge. Marsyas picked it up and became an expert on the flute. He challenged Apollo to a musical contest: his flute playing against Apollo’s skill with the lyre. The winner could do whatever he wanted to the loser. The Muses were the judges. When they declared Apollo the winner, he flayed Marsyas alive.

2 Olympus was a satyr, a brother of Marsyas and his pupil.
from his chest, he exposed the ivory in his left shoulder. When Pelops was born, this shoulder was made of flesh and coloured just like his shoulder on the right. But then, soon after birth, he was sliced up in pieces at his father’s hands, and, so people say, the gods, once they collected all the parts, put Pelops back together. But one piece between his upper arm and neck was missing. So they used some ivory to replace the part they could not find, and in this way they reconstructed all of Pelops’ body.¹

The leading men of regions close to Thebes assembled there, and the near-by cities urged their rulers to go and offer Thebes their sympathies—Argos and Mycenae, the home of Pelops’ family, Sparta, Calydon (before it became despised by harsh Diana), Ithoborchomenus, Corinth (well known for bronze), fierce Messene, Patrae, low-lying Cleonae, Pylos (the city of Neleus), and Troezen (before king Pittheus was in control), and all the other cities which are closed off by the Isthmus with seas on either side, as well as cities which are seen to lie beyond the confines of those narrow coasts.² How could anyone believe that Athens was the only place which did not respond? War hindered her from doing her duty, for barbarian hordes had come by sea and were terrorizing the city’s walls. Then Tereus from Thrace with his army

¹In Greek mythology, Pelops’ father, Tantalus, chopped him up to make a dinner offering to the gods. The gods, however, sensed the plot and restored the boy. However, Demeter had already eaten a missing part. Hence, it had to be replaced with a piece of ivory fashioned by Hephaestus.

²They were offering sympathy for the destruction of Amphion, Niobe, and their family (the royal house of Thebes). The Isthmus (of Corinth) is the narrow stretch of land joining the Peloponnese to mainland Greece. The two seas are the Aegean and the Ionian seas, on either side. The first group of cities named are south of the Isthmus (i.e., in the Peloponnese). Those beyond the Isthmus would be in mainland Greece (i.e., north and east of the Isthmus). Calydon became despised by Diana because king Oeneus neglected to dedicate the first fruits of his orchard to the goddess (for Ovid’s treatment of the story see 8.429 ff.). Pittheus is a son of Pelops and king of Troezen.
of auxiliaries beat those barbarians and gained a great name for his victory.

Now, Tereus was an important man, with wealth and power, who traced his descent from mighty Mars himself, so Pandion, king of Athens, gave his daughter Procne to him in marriage. But neither the Graces nor Hymen was present at the wedding, nor was Juno, who blesses married brides.
The Furies held up the wedding torches,
which they had taken from a funeral,
and they prepared the marriage bed, as well,
while the ominous screech owl hovered high above the house and settled on the roof above their chamber.¹ Such were the omens when Procne and Tereus were married, such the omens, too, when they had a child.
It’s true that Thrace congratulated them,
and they themselves gave thanks to all the gods.
They commanded that the day when Procne, Pandion’s daughter, and Thrace’s famous king were married, as well as the day on which their son, Itys, was born, should be declared a public holiday. That shows how much what really matters lies concealed from us.

Now the Titan Sun had drawn the seasons of the revolving year through five autumns, when Procne, trying to coax her husband,
said to him:

“If you feel anything for me, either let me go to see my sister,
or let my sister come to visit us.
You can promise my father she’ll be back before too long. If you could arrange things so I can see my sister Philomela, you’d be giving me a truly lovely gift.”

¹The Furies, as goddesses of blood revenge, especially within the family, are hardly the appropriate deities to preside over a wedding.
Tereus told his men to launch a ship, and, using sails and oars, he made the trip to the port of Cecrops’ city, landing at Piraeus.¹ There, as soon as he met his father-in-law, they linked right hands, and Tereus offered his best wishes. He had started to explain the reason for his arrival and his wife’s request, promising that if her sister visited, she would come back soon, when, lo and behold, Philomela arrived, looking gorgeous in her rich garments, but even richer in her own loveliness. She looked just like what we so often hear about in stories of the naiads and the dryads who roam around the middle of the woods, if only they possessed her dress and her refinement. Tereus saw the girl and was on fire, just as if someone were to place a flame under dry ears of grain or set a torch to piles of leaves or hay stacked in a barn. Her beauty, it’s true, deserved such feelings, but he was driven on by natural lust, and people from his country tend to have strong sexual passions.² So he caught fire thanks to his country’s vices and his own. His desire wishes to corrupt the care of her attendants and her nurse’s trust, to tempt the girl herself with immense gifts, whatever his whole kingdom can afford, or carry her off and defend the rape with savage warfare. He is so consumed with unbridled passion, there is nothing he will not dare, for he has no power to repress the fires blazing in his chest. And now he cannot cope with a delay. His eager mouth returns to the request from Procne, and beneath her very words he states what he himself desires. His feelings make him eloquent. When he keeps asking ¹Cecrops’ city is Athens, and Pireus the port adjacent to it.

²Tereus is from Thrace in northern Greece and is therefore be considered far less civilized than the Athenians or the Greeks generally.
beyond what is polite, he makes it clear that this is what Procne has requested.
He even adds his tears, as well, as though she has instructed him to use those, too.
By gods above, how much hidden darkness the human heart contains! The very things Tereus does to promote his evil scheme make them believe he is compassionate.
The people praise him for his evil deeds.
Philomela desires the same thing, too.
With her arms around her father’s shoulders, she coaxes him to let her travel there, to visit her sister. She urges him for her own well being, though what she seeks will work against her. Tereus looks on, and, as he gazes at her, imagines he is holding her already. He sees her kiss her father, putting both her arms around his neck, and he absorbs it all as an incitement, adding food and fuel to his frenetic lust. And every time she holds her father to her, he desires to be that father—although if he were, his feelings would be no less abhorrent. Pandion gives way to the entreaties from both of them. Philomela rejoices, thanks her father, and thinks, unlucky girl, she and her sister have now won the day, when that success will bring on both of them enormous grief.

The work of sun god Phoebus by now was almost done. His horses’ hooves were drumming on the slopes of western skies. A royal feast had been set out on tables with wine in golden cups. They ate their fill and then retired to have a peaceful sleep. But although Tereus, the Thracian king, went to bed, he burned for Philomela, recalling her face, her hands, her movements, imagining those parts he had not seen to be just as he would want them. He fed the fires within him and grew so restless he could not sleep. Dawn came. As Tereus was leaving, Pandion clasped the right hand of his son-in-law and, with tears running down his cheeks, implored him to look after his daughter Philomela:

“My dear son,
because affection compels me to it,
and both my daughters wish it, and you, too, Tereus, have said this is what you want,
I entrust her to your care. I beg you,
by your honour, by our united hearts, and by gods above, to take care of her with a father’s love and to send her back as soon as possible, this sweet comfort in my worrisome old age. Any delay will be too long for me. And Philomela, if you have any affection for me, come back to me as quickly as you can. It’s enough your sister is so far away.”

He gave these instructions to his daughter and kissed her. As he issued his orders, he wept quiet tears. Then he asked them both, as a pledge of faith, for their two right hands. These he took and joined, and then he told them to remember to greet on his behalf his absent child and grandson. His voice choked. Convulsed with sobs, he could hardly manage a last farewell. His mind was so afraid, filled with an ominous sense of trouble.

As soon as Philomela was on board and the painted ship had moved away from land, as oar blades churned the sea, Tereus cries:

“I have triumphed! I am taking with me just what I desire!”

The barbarian king is overjoyed. He has trouble putting off the pleasures his mind conjures up. His eyes never turn away from her, just as an eagle, Jupiter’s swift bird of prey, sets a hare, gripped in its hooked claws, inside its lofty nest, and the prisoner has no place to flee, while the predator keeps gazing at its prey.

And now the trip is over. Once they reach Tereus’ land, they leave the sea-worn ship, and the king hauls Pandion’s daughter off to a high-walled building, hidden away in an ancient forest, and locks her in. Philomela, pale, trembling, and in tears, afraid of everything about the place, keeps asking where her sister is. The king reveals his criminal desire, and then his force overpowers the lonely girl, who often screams in vain to her father, often to her sister, and above all, to the mighty gods. She trembles with fear, like a terrified lamb wounded by the jaws of a grey wolf and later cast aside, which does not realize it is now safe, or like a dove with its feathers soaking in its own blood, panic stricken, afraid of the ravenous claws which snatched it up. Soon, when she regains her senses, she tears her dishevelled hair, like someone mourning, scratches her arms, beats them against her breast, stretches out her hands, and screams:

“You barbarian!
Think of what you have done, you savage beast!
Are you quite unmoved by what my father asked of you with such affectionate tears, or by any feelings for my sister, or my innocence, or your marriage vow? You have confounded everything! I am now forced to be my sister’s substitute and you the partner of the two of us! Procne will have to be my enemy. Why did you not rip out this life of mine, you traitor? Then your crime would be complete! I wish you’d killed me before committing this abominable rape. Then my shade would have been free of shame. But if the gods observe these things, if celestial powers have any influence, if everything is not destroyed along with me, then you will pay me for this someday. I myself will throw away all sense of shame and shout what you have done. And if I get the chance, I'll move among your people with the story.
If I'm kept a prisoner in the woods,
I'll fill the forest with my voice and move
the rocks, which know how you have ruined me!
Let heaven hear these things—and gods, as well,
if any gods live there!"

Philomela’s words
angered the king and also roused his fear.
Spurred by both emotions, he pulled the sword he carried out of its scabbard, grabbed her by the hair, forced her arms behind her back, and tied her up. Once she saw his sword, Philomela fully believed and hoped
she would be killed and offered him her throat.
But as she struggled to speak and pour forth her anger, calling out her father’s name repeatedly, Tereus seized her tongue with pincers, and using his savage blade he sliced it out. The bottom of her tongue still quivered in place, but the tongue itself lay trembling on the dark earth, muttering.
It wriggled about (the same way a tail from a snake will commonly keep moving when it has been cut off), as if, in dying, it was seeking some trace of its mistress.
They say (though this I hardly dare believe) that even after this abhorrent crime Tereus, in his lust, violated
her mutilated body many times.

After committing these atrocities, Tereus calms down and returns to Procne, who, as soon as she sees her husband, asks about her sister. He pretends to sigh and tells a made-up story of her death.
The tears he sheds make her believe his lies.
From her shoulders Procne tears her splendid robes richly woven with gold and clothes herself in black. She builds an empty burial vault, where she makes sacrifices for a ghost who does not exist and laments the fate of a sister for whom death chants like that are not appropriate.

The sun god circles through twelve constellations. A year goes by. What can Philomela do? There is a guard to keep her from escaping, and the walls of the place where she is held are thick, made out of solid rock. Her speechless lips can provide no details of what happened. But pain promotes great ingenuity, and when times are bad one grows resourceful. With great skill she pulls thread into a warp on a barbarian loom, and, by weaving patterns of purple on a white background, she depicts the crime. Once she is finished,
she entrusts the weaving to a servant,
asking her with gestures to present it to the queen, her mistress, and the servant,
as requested, carries it to Procne, not knowing what the woven work contains.
The wife of the savage tyrant unfolds the tapestry and, looking at it, reads her sister’s dreadful fate. She says nothing. It is amazing she can keep so quiet, but grief prevents her speech. Her tongue seeks out words which might be adequate to express her murderous rage, but cannot find them. With no time to weep, she rushes ahead, so totally intent on her revenge,
she no longer separates right from wrong.

It was now time for young Thracian women to celebrate the Bacchic festival which, following their traditions, is held at three-year intervals. These rites take place at night, when Mount Rhodope re-echoes to sounds of clashing brass.¹ In the darkness, the queen leaves home, dressed to participate in sacred rituals and holding weapons

¹Rhodope is a mountain in Thrace.
for the ecstatic ceremonial rites, vine leaves wrapped around her head and deerskin hanging down one side, with a slender spear across her shoulder. Procne runs ahead with throngs of her companions through the woods, instilling terror. She keeps pretending that you, Bacchus, have inspired her frenzy, but she is driven on by frantic grief.
At length, rushing through the trackless forest,
she arrives at Philomela’s building.
Procne, screaming and howling Bacchic cries, shatters the doors and seizes her sister.
She dresses her in ritual garments
as one of the god’s enraptured worshippers, concealing her face with leaves of ivy, drags the terrified girl away from there,
and leads her back inside the palace walls.

When Philomela saw that she had come to that dreadful home, the bewildered girl trembled with horror, and her face grew pale.
But Procne, once in the house, took away
the symbols of the Bacchic ritual, uncovering her wretched sister’s face,
and tried to hug her. But Philomela, filled with shame, could not bear to raise her eyes.
She thinks she is a whore who has been false to her own sister. So she kept her gaze fixed on the ground. She wished to take an oath, with the gods as witnesses, that her shame was forced upon her, and she tried to use her hands to show it, for she had no voice.
But Procne was ablaze—she could not check her rage—and stopped her sister’s tears, saying:

“No weeping now. This is a time for swords, or something else more powerful than steel,
if you have such a thing available.
Sister, I am prepared for any crime.
I could set the royal palace on fire with torches, hurl that treacherous Tereus in the middle of the flames, or with a sword slice out his tongue, eyes, or the sexual parts he used to shame you, or I could expel his guilty soul out through a thousand wounds!
I am prepared for a tremendous act—
but what that act will be, I’m still not sure.”

As Procne said this, her young son Itys came to his mother, and she sensed from him what she could do. While watching him, her eyes grew cold, and she muttered:

“How much you look
just like your father!”

That was all she said.
Then, seething with silent rage, she began to hatch her ghastly plan. But when the boy ran to greet his mother, placed his small arms around her neck, kissed her, and then added some childish words of love, his mother was truly shaken, her anger wavered.
Against her will her eyes filled up with tears.
But as soon as she felt too much emotion eroding her resolve, she glanced away and looked back at her sister’s face. Gazing at each of them in turn, she asked:

“Why is it
that one of them speaks of his affection and the other has had her tongue removed and does not talk? He can call me mother.
Why can she not call me sister? Just look, daughter of Pandion, at your husband, the man you married. You are not worthy of your race. In someone married to Tereus showing affection is a filthy crime!”

She did not pause, but dragged Itys away to a distant room in the lofty home, just like a tigress on the Ganges’ banks hauling a baby fawn through shady trees.
Already sensing what his fate might be,
the child stretched out his hands and cried,

“Mother!
Mother!”
He tried to reach around her neck, but Procne plunged her sword into his side, close to his heart. She did not look away. That one blow was enough to kill him, but Philomela then took up the sword and cut his throat, and while the limbs were warm, still showing signs of life, they sliced him up and set some pieces boiling in bronze pots, as others hissed while roasting there on spits. The inner chamber dripped with blood and gore.

Procne then invites Tereus, her husband, who has no idea of what they’re doing, to a feast. She falsely states that the meal is a sacred ritual of her homeland. Claiming the only one the law permits to be there is the husband, she dismisses his followers and attendants. And thus, Tereus sits in his high ancestral seat, feasting by himself, filling his stomach with his own flesh and blood, so out of touch with what is going on, he calls to her:

“Bring Itys here!”

Procne cannot conceal her savage exultation. Eager now to proclaim the news about the slaughter she has carried out, she shouts:

“You have him in there with you—the one you’re calling for!”

Tereus looks and asks where Itys is. While he is searching, calling out again, Philomela jumps at him, just as she is, hair soaking from the appalling murder, and thrusts the head of Itys, dripping blood, right in his father’s face. At that moment, more so than any other, she wishes she could speak and proclaim her great delight in words which match her mood.
The Thracian king gives a tremendous roar and pushes back the table, screaming out to the Furies, those snake-haired sisters from the deep valley of the Styx. Now, if it were possible, he would tear his chest apart and disgorge the dreadful meal of half-digested flesh. He weeps and calls himself the wretched tomb of his own son. And then with his sword drawn he chases after Pandion’s daughters. But you would think those Athenian women have bodies now held up on feathered wings, for they are taking flight. One of them flies into the woods. The other nests down up in the eaves, still carrying traces of that murder on her breast, her feathers stained with blood. Tereus, swift in his grief and cravings for revenge, is also turned into a bird, with a crested head plume and, instead of his long sword, a huge beak jutting out in front. This bird, which looks armed, has a name and is called the hoopoe bird.¹

The pain of these events sent Pandion to shades of Tartarus before his time, before the final days of his old age. So then the royal sceptre of Athens and management of its affairs were passed to Erectheus, a man whose justice and power in war no one could dispute. He had four sons and as many daughters. Two of the girls were well matched in beauty. One of them, Procris, had a happy marriage to Cephalus, grandson of Aeolus, and the other daughter, Orithyia, was loved by the god of the northern wind, Boreas, but for a long time his love could not attain her—he was hurt by links to the Thracians and Tereus.² He pleaded,

¹Ovid does not here indicate the species of the other two birds, but in the traditional myth Procne becomes a nightingale and Philomela a swallow.
²Boreas is from the north, that is, from the regions of Thrace, where Tereus came from (i.e., not a place Athenians would think well of after the recent events).
choosing to use persuasion and not force. But when his pleasant words had no effect, he bristled with rage—his usual mood and natural state for most of the time—and cried out:

“I’m entitled to my rage!
Why did I abandon my own weapons?
My power and anger, my violence, my threatening spirit? Why have I turned to what does not suit me—playing beggar?
My way relies on force. With force I drive off the menacing storm clouds, whip up the sea, overturn knotted oaks, harden the snow, and batter the ground with hail. And then, when I meet my brothers in the open air (for that’s my battlefield) I fight with them so fiercely that the middle sky resounds with our collisions, and fires flash out, discharged from hollow clouds. And then again, when I move down to those empty caverns deep in the earth and fiercely push my back against the lowest depths, my tremors shake the entire world, even shadows of the dead.¹ That is how I should have sought this marriage, not by begging Erechtheus to become my father-in-law, but by forcing him.”

With these or other equally potent words Boreas shook out his wings, whose motions blow winds all through the earth and agitate broad surface waters of the sea. Trailing his gloomy cloak across the mountain peaks, the lover rushed along the ground, concealed in darkness, and swept Orithyia, trembling with fear, up in his tawny wings. As he flew, the ravisher’s fires were stirred and burned with greater heat. He did not stop that flight through the air until he reached the city walls where the Cicones dwell.²

¹Some ancient thinkers believed that winds played a major role in causing a wide range of natural phenomena, including lightning and earthquakes.
²The Cicones lived in Thrace, to the north of Greece.
There the girl from Athens became the wife of the icy tyrant—a mother, too, producing twins, two brothers, both of whom were like their mother in every feature, but for their father’s wings. Yet people say their bodies had no wings when they were born, and as long as they lacked a beard to match their golden hair, the boys Calaïs and Zethes, had no wings at all. But then, once yellow hair began to grow on their two cheeks, feathers started to appear above both shoulders, just as in birds. So when their childish years were finished, they both joined the Argonauts and sailed over unknown seas in that first ship to seek out the glistening Golden Fleece.¹

¹Ovid does not here use the adjective “golden,” although the fleece he is referring to commonly has that epithet. Nor does Ovid use the term “Argonauts”; he calls the adventurers “Minyans,” a name which usually refers to inhabitants of Boeotia. The men who sailed off after the fleece were commonly called the Argonauts (after their ship, the Argo).
BOOK VII

[The Argonauts visit king Aeetes in Colchis; Medea’s love for Jason; Medea agrees to help Jason; Jason tames the fire-breathing bulls, sows the dragon’s teeth, defeats the earth-born warriors, puts the dragon to sleep, and takes the Golden Fleece; Jason and Medea return to Thessaly; Medea’s magic restores Aeson’s life; Medea rejuvenates the nymphs who nursed Bacchus; Medea tricks the daughters of Pelias into killing their father; Medea’s flight from Thessaly; the transformation of Cynicus into a swan and of Hyrië into a lake; Medea at Corinth; her revenge against Jason; Medea in Athens; Medea’s marriage to king Aegeus; Medea’s attempt to poison Theseus; Athens celebrates the achievements of Theseus; Minos prepares for war; Minos visits Aegina; Aeacus refuses Minos help; Cephalus asks Aeacus for help; Aeacus describes the plague in Aegina; the Myrmidons appear; Cephalus tells Aeacus’ son the story of his wife, Procris, of his abduction by Aurora, of his tests of Procris’ fidelity, of her life as a follower of Diana; of his dog Laelaps and the monstrous fox, and of his wife’s death; Aeacus gives Cephalus soldiers to assist him against Minos.]

By now, in their ship built at Pagasae, the Argonauts were carving their passage across the sea. They had paid a visit to Phineas, who was dragging out his life in helpless, permanently blind old age. The young sons of Boreas had chased off the Harpies, those birds with young girl’s faces, from the poor man’s island. ¹ After meeting many challenges with famous Jason in command, they finally made their way to the swift stream of the muddy Phasis. ² While they were meeting with king Aeetes, asking him to return the Golden Fleece from that ram which had carried Phrixus off, and while king Aeetes was proposing his grotesque conditions, which demanded enormous labours from the Argonauts, the daughter of the king, Medea, was seized

---

¹Phineas was punished by Jupiter, who blinded him and placed him on an island where his food was stolen by Harpies, flying monsters with female faces. Boreas is the god of the North Wind; his sons are Calais and Zethes, mentioned at the end of Book 6.

²The Phasis is a river in Colchis, a region in the western Caucasus (on the eastern shores of the Black Sea). Jason, son of Aeson and a prince of Iolcus (in Thessaly), was seeking to win back his father’s kingship by acquiring the Golden Fleece. He assembled a crew of heroic figures to sail with him: Calais, Zethes, Hercules, Philoctetes, Peleus, Telamon, Orpheus, Castor, Pollux, Atalanta (the only woman), and Euphemus.
by fiercely passionate love for Jason.¹
For a while she tried to fight against it, but when her reason could not overcome
her feelings, she said:

“To struggle like this, Medea, is useless. Some god—I don’t know which one—is going against you. I suppose that this,
or something like it, is what people call being in love. For why do those demands my father makes strike me as very harsh?
And, in fact, they are far too harsh! But why am I afraid this man might come to grief, when I’ve only now just seen him? What is it that makes me so afraid? Unhappy girl, if you can do it, you must douse these flames which you have fanned inside your virgin heart!
If I could, I’d act with greater wisdom,
but some new force is pulling me along.
My desire tells me one thing, and my mind says something else. I see the better way and want to go there, but I take the worse.
Why, you royal virgin, are you on fire for a stranger? Why these dreams of marriage in a foreign land? For this country, too, can offer you someone to love. The gods will determine if this man lives or dies.
But let him live! I may make that prayer, even if I’m not in love. For what crime is Jason guilty of? Apart from those with pitiless hearts, who would not be touched by Jason’s youth, noble birth, and courage?
Or if he lacked all other qualities, who could resist his beauty? For it’s true—he has really moved my heart. And unless I offer my help, the breath of the bulls will scorch him, or he will have to battle against those earth-born enemies sprung up from seeds which he himself has sown, or else
he will be offered up as cruel prey

¹Phrixus had been saved from death by a winged ram with a fleece of gold, which had carried him to Colchis. He sacrificed the ram to Neptune, and Aeetes, king of Colchis, kept the fleece in a grove, where it was guarded by a dragon. Jason is asking Aeetes to return the fleece.
to that ravenous snake. If I stand by and let this happen, I’ll be confessing a tigress was my mother and my heart is made of iron and stone. Why do I not watch him die—contaminate my eyes by looking on? Why do I not incite the bulls or the ferocious earth-born men, or the dragon that never sleeps to fight against him? May the wishes of the gods bring better things! But I should not just pray for this to happen. I should do something! Should I then betray my father’s kingdom and use my power to save a stranger I don’t even know, so that with my help he may remain unhurt, then sail away without me, get married to someone else, leaving Medea here, abandoning her to face her punishment? If he could do that, if he could prefer some other woman to me, then let the thankless wretch perish! But with that face, nobility of soul, and handsome form of his, I need not fear he will deceive me or forget my help. Besides, he will promise himself to me in advance. I will call upon the gods to witness what we pledge. Why be afraid, when you will be quite safe? Prepare yourself, and do not wait. Jason will forever be indebted to you. He’ll marry you in a solemn rite, and throngs of women in Pelasgian cities will honour you as the one who saved him. So shall I then be carried off by winds and leave behind my country, my sister, brother, father, and my gods, as well? But then my father is a savage creature, my native land a barbarous place, and my young brother still a child. My sister’s prayers are with me, and the greatest god is here inside me!

---

1Medea here is listing the tasks her father, king Aeetes, has set Jason, if he wishes to get back the Golden Fleece.

2The term Pelasgian refers to all of Greece. The name is derived from the early inhabitants of the region. At times, however, it denotes a specific area (e.g., Thessaly).
I will not be leaving what is great behind, no, I will be pursuing what is great—honour for saving these young men of Greece, a knowledge of much finer lands and towns whose fame is celebrated, even here,
and the arts and culture of those regions.
Then there’s Jason, for whom I’d willingly trade everything the entire world contains.
Once he is my husband, I will be called a happy woman, well loved by the gods, and my head will touch the stars. Yes, but then what of those stories people talk about—rocks clashing in the middle of the sea, Charybdis, the enemy of sailors, who sucks down the sea and then spews it back, and brutal Scylla with her savage dogs barking in the deep seas of Sicily?
But as I am carried across the sea on that long voyage, I will be holding the man I love, embracing Jason’s chest.
In his arms I will have no fears at all, or, if I do, I will be afraid for him, only for my husband. But, Medea, do you really think this is a marriage? Are you not wrapping crime in lovely names?
Instead of doing that, you should consider just how great a wrong you are proposing and, while you can, avoid such treachery.”

Medea finished. Her eyes were gazing at those virtues standing right before her—right, piety, and modesty. Cupid, now overpowered, turned his back on her.

Medea set off for the ancient altars of Hecate, Perses’ daughter, hidden in a shadowy grove, deep in the woods. At this point she was firm. Her emotions, now repressed, had ebbed. But then she saw him, the son of Aeson, and the dampened fires burst into flame again. Her cheeks turned red, and her whole face grew hot. Just as a spark buried in the ashes piled above it is often fed by winds, grows, and, once stirred, regains the strength it had before, that’s how her passion (now so dull, you would have thought by this time it had died) blazed up again, when she observed the young man standing there in front of her. And, as it so happened, on that particular day Aeson’s son was looking especially attractive. Her love would be so easy to forgive! She gazed at him, her eyes fixed on his face, as if it was the first time she had seen him, so disconcerted she did not believe the man she was looking at was mortal. She could not turn away. When the stranger reached for her right hand and began to speak, requesting in a humble voice her help and promising marriage, Medea burst into tears and answered:

---

1The clashing rocks are the Symplegades, which threaten ships at the entrance to the Black Sea. Charybdis is a whirlpool and Scylla a six-headed monster. They stand on either side of the straits separating Italy from Sicily.

“I understand what I am doing. I am being seduced by love, not by ignorance of the truth. I will do what I can to save you, but then, once you are safe, give me what you promise!”

Jason swore by the sacred rituals of the three-formed goddess, by the spirit in that grove, by the all-discerning Sun, father of his future father-in-law, by his own exploits, and by the dangers, those immense perils, he would face. His oath convinced Medea. He received from her immediately some magic herbs and learned how to apply them. Then, he made his way back to the palace, overjoyed.

The next day, once Aurora scatters the glittering stars,

---

1The three-formed goddess was Hecate, who was commonly depicted with three faces (often of a horse, dog, and snake). The Sun is the father of Aeetes, Medea’s father. people stream to the sacred field of Mars and gather in position on the ridge. Aeetes himself sits in the middle, dressed in purple. His ivory sceptre makes him conspicuous. Then, lo and behold, bronze-footed bulls are snorting Vulcan’s fire from adamantine nostrils! Their hot breath scorches the grass and sets the ground alight. Just as fully stoked flaming forges roar or limestone baked in earthen furnaces, as it absorbs the heat, makes a loud hiss when water drops are sprinkled over it, that’s how the chests and parched throats of those bulls resound, as they pant out the roiling flames they hold inside. But the son of Aeson moves out to meet them. As he comes nearer, the dreadful beasts turn their ferocious heads and iron-tipped horns towards him, pawing the dusty earth with cloven hooves, bellowing, filling the air with smoke. The Argonauts are stiff with fear. Jason moves to the bulls. He does not feel their fire-laden breath (such is the power of magic potions!). His hand boldly strokes their hanging dewlaps and harnesses the beasts under the yoke. He forces them to pull the heavy plough and with its blade carves up the untilled field. The Colchians are stunned. The Argonauts shout even louder, spurring Jason on. Then from a bronze helmet he takes out the dragon’s teeth and scatters them, like seed, across the field he has just ploughed. These seeds have earlier been soaked in potent venom and, once implanted in the soil, grow soft. The sown teeth sprout and then begin to turn into new bodies. Just as an infant child acquires its human shape within the womb of its own mother, forming parts inside, and does not come out into the open air before its body is complete, so these men do not emerge out of the fertile soil until they are full grown inside the womb of pregnant Earth. Even more amazing, they are brandishing weapons created at the same time they are. The Pelasgians watching these warriors about to hurl their sharp pointed spears at young Jason’s head are fearful—their faces fall, their spirits fail them. Even Medea feels afraid, though she has taken steps to keep him safe. When she sees the young man all by himself with so many enemies assailing him, the blood drains from her face. She sits down, suddenly chilled and pale. And just in case the power of the herbs she has provided is insufficient, she recites a spell to help him and invokes her secret arts. Jason picks up a heavy rock and throws it right in the middle of his enemies and turns the fight from an attack on him into a battle where those warriors go after their own ranks. So those brothers, created from the earth, wound one another and die, falling in an internecine fight. The Achaeans cheer, clutch the winner’s hand, and throw their arms eagerly around him. And you, barbarian princess, you, too, would like to hold the victor in your arms, but your fear of being shamed prevents you. You would embrace him, but are held in check by concerns about your reputation. You do what is appropriate—rejoice with silent feeling and then offer thanks to your spells and to the gods who craft them.

Jason still had to use his magic herbs to put the dragon to sleep. This creature, distinguished by its crest and triple tongue and with hooked teeth—a terrifying sight!—was the custodian of the tree which held the Golden Fleece. Once Jason had sprinkled the beast with herbal juices which produce a Lethean sleep and had muttered three times the words which bring calm slumbers, using spells which soothe stormy seas and raging rivers, sleep settled on that dragon’s sleepless eyes, and Aeson’s heroic son carried off the Golden Fleece. Proud of what he had won and taking with him as another prize the person who had made that possible, triumphant Jason reached the port of Iolchos with his wife, Medea.

In Thessaly, mothers and aged fathers offered gifts for their sons’ safe return and in the flames poured heaps of incense. As they had promised, they led in and killed a sacrificial beast, whose horns they had wrapped in gold. But Aeson, Jason’s father, did not participate in their rejoicing, for, worn down by age, he was now close to death. With this in mind, Jason spoke about him to Medea:

“Wife, to you, I admit, I owe my life, and though you have given me everything and the sum total of your services is beyond belief, if your enchantments can do it (and what can those spells of yours not bring about?) then take away some years from my own life and add them to my father’s.”

Jason could not check his tears. Medea was moved by the love Jason had displayed in making the request. She thought about her very different feelings for her father, king Aeetes, whom she had left behind. However, that thought did not affect her, and she said:

“Husband, what unholy scheme has just passed through your lips? Do I look as if I can transfer part of your life to someone else? Hecate would not approve, and what you ask is not appropriate. But, Jason, I will try to give a gift greater than the one you have requested. Using my arts, I will try to lengthen

---

1. Lethe is one of the five rivers of Hades. Its waters have the power of making people forget, of bringing on oblivion, and (in this case) inducing sleep.
your father’s life without reducing yours,
if Hecate, the goddess of three forms, will only give her personal consent to such an immense and daring action and lend us her support.”

It was three nights
before the moon’s horns were completely joined into a sphere. But once the full moon shone and her whole shape gazed down on earth, Medea slipped from the palace in loose-fitting robes.
Her feet were bare, and her uncovered hair hung down across her shoulders. She moved off, without attendants, through the still silence of the night. Deep slumbers had brought calm rest to men and birds and beasts. There was no sound in any hedgerow. Still leaves were silent, and silent, too, the dewy air. Nothing moved, except the quivering stars. Stretching her arms, Medea turned herself around three times, sprinkled water taken from a flowing stream three times above her head, and then three times her mouth let out a piercing howl. Knees bent, she knelt down on the solid earth and cried:

“O Night, most faithful to these sacred rites, and all you stars who, with the golden moon,
follow the fiery light of day, and you, triple-formed Hecate, who understand what we intend and come here eagerly to undertake the task of helping us with our sorcerer’s chants and rituals, and you, O Earth, who grows the potent herbs enchanters use, and you winds and breezes, hills, streams, and lakes, you gods of every grove,
and all you gods of Night, be present here—
all those who help me, whenever I wish to reverse a river’s flow, make it run past its astonished banks back to its source, and with my magic soothe tempestuous seas or stir up tranquil waters, scatter clouds and bring them on, summon the stormy winds and have them die away. With spells and chants I break the serpent’s jaws, rip living oaks and boulders from their native soil, move trees, and order hills to shake and earth to groan and shadows of the dead to leave their tombs! And you, O Moon, I also draw you down in an eclipse, although Temesan brass is there to ease your pain.¹ And my spells make the chariot of the Sun, my grandfather, grow pale, and from my poisons Aurora loses colour! On my behalf, you cooled the fire from those bulls and forced their necks beneath the yoke to pull the curving plough, a task they could not bear. You made those men born from dragon’s teeth fight one another in savage battle, and you lulled to sleep the guardian of the fleece, who never slept, and by deceiving him, sent that treasure off to towns in Greece. Now I need the juice by which old age, once renewed, can revert to the prime of life, get back youthful years. And that you will provide—that’s why those stars are sparkling, why a chariot is on its way drawn by the necks of dragons on the wing.”

A chariot was there, sent down from heaven, and once Medea had climbed in, patted the dragons’ harnessed necks, picked up the reins, and given them a shake, it snatched her off, up to the sky. Looking down on Tempe, in Thessaly lying far below her, she drove the dragons on to certain places, where she inspected herbs they might provide—to Ossa as well as lofty Pelion to Othrys, Pindus, and Mount Olympus, an even higher peak. She took the plants which pleased her, pulling some out by the roots, and cutting others with a curved bronze knife. She gathered many from the river banks of Apidanus and Amphrysus streams, and, Enipeus, you were not neglected. The waters of Peneus and Spercheus gave her their herbs, as did the reed-filled shores of Boebe’s lake. And beside Anthedon, in Euboea, she picked a long-lived plant, not yet famous for the transformation it later brought about in Glaucus’ body.¹

¹As mentioned in an earlier footnote, people made loud noises with brass instruments to get the moon back during an eclipse. Temese was a city in Italy famous for its copper.

Nine days and nights Medea moved around, drawn in her chariot by those winged dragons, examining the fields. Then she came back. The dragons had not eaten any food. They had only breathed the odour of those herbs, and yet they had cast off their skins, the mark of their advancing years. She reached her door, right at the threshold, but remained outside, with nothing but the sky above her head. Shunning the company of men, she built two altars out of turf—one on the right for Hecate, one on the left for Youth.²

When she had covered these with sacred boughs from the forest wilderness, she dug out two ditches in the earth close by and then performed a holy sacrifice, plunging her knife in a black ram’s throat and soaking the open ditches with her victim’s blood. Next, she poured goblets of liquid honey on the blood and, in a second offering, cups filled with heated milk. As she poured, she uttered spells, calling on the spirits of the earth, imploring the king of shades and his ravished wife not to take the life still left in the old man’s limbs too quickly.

When she has appeased the gods with prayers and lengthy incantations, she orders Aeson’s exhausted body to be brought into the open air. Then with her spells she puts him into a deep and death-like sleep and stretches him on a layer of herbs. She orders Jason and his attendants to go away, advising them to take ¹Apidanus and Amphrysus are rivers in Thessaly, Boebe a lake in Thessaly, and Anthedon a town in Boeotia. Glaucus ate a certain herb and was changed into a sea god. Ovid tells his story in Book 13.

²This goddess, also called Hebe, is a daughter of Juno and the wife of Hercules on Olympus (after Hercules was taken up into the company of gods).
their profane eyes far from her mysteries. They disperse, as she has asked. Medea, with her hair dishevelled, circles around the flaming altars, like a worshipper of Bacchus. She dips her branching torches into the dark ditches, stains them with blood, and at the altars lights them in the fire. Next she purifies old Aeson, three times with flame, three times with water, and three times with sulphur. Meanwhile, a potent mixture in a bronze cauldron set above the flames is boiling, seething white with bubbling froth. In this vessel Medea cooks some roots she dug from fields in Thessaly, with seeds, flowers, and black herbal juices, adding stones gathered from the most distant regions of the East and sand washed by ebbing seas. She puts in hoar frost she scraped up at night by moonlight, the ominous wings and flesh of a screech owl, and the cut-up entrails of the ambiguous werewolf, which can change its bestial visage to a human face. And she does not forget the scaly skin from a thin Cinypian water snake, and liver from a long-lived stag. With these, she includes the eggs and head from a crow which has lived nine human generations.¹

When the barbarian princess had used these and a thousand other items to attain her more than mortal purpose, she stirred up the whole mix with the branch of a mild olive, long since dried out, blending what was on top with what was underneath. Lo and behold, in that hot bronze cauldron the old stick changed! First it turned green and then, soon after that, sprouted leaves and suddenly was loaded with a heavy weight of fruit. When the flames made foam boil over from the hollow bronze and warm drops hit the earth, the ground turned green. Soft grass and flowers sprang up from the soil.

¹The stag and the crow were supposed to live much longer than human beings. Cinyps is a river in north Africa.
BOOK SEVEN

When she saw this, Medea drew a knife, slit open Aeson’s throat, let his old blood flow out, and replaced it with her juices. After the old man had absorbed these fluids, some passing through his mouth, some through his wound, at once the colour of his hair and beard changed from white to black, his skeletal frame in one heart beat had vanished, his pallor and debility were gone, compact flesh smoothed out his hollow wrinkles, and his limbs grew large and strong. Aeson was astonished, recalling he had been just like this once, some forty years ago.

From high above, Bacchus witnessed the amazing miracle of this prodigious feat and realized Medea could restore the youthful years of Nysean nymphs who had been his nurses. So he requested and received this gift from the royal princess of Colchis.¹

And her magic spells do not stop there. Medea then pretends she has had a quarrel with her husband and, under false pretenses, runs away as a suppliant to Pelias, the king.² Because Pelias is himself worn out and very old, his daughters welcome her. By simulating friendship with deceit, crafty Medea soon makes them her friends, and when she tells them that of her good deeds the greatest is the way she has removed Aeson’s frailty and when she lingers on that tale, in Pelias’ daughters she creates the hope that similar spells could restore the youth of their own father. They ask Medea to do it, telling her to name her price. She remains quite silent for a while and appears to hesitate, ¹Bacchus, as a child, had been nursed by the nymphs of Nysea.

²Pelias was the brother of Aeson (hence, Jason’s uncle). He had deprived Aeson of the kingship of Iochus and had sent Jason on the quest for the Golden Fleece.
keeping those who are urging the request in doubt, pretending she is still unsure. Soon, however, she promises to try. She tells them:

“To give you more confidence in this talent of mine, your oldest ram, of all your sheep the leader of the flock, will, thanks to my medicines, become a lamb.”

Immediately they lead in a woolly beast, a feeble creature thoroughly worn out with innumerable years. Its ancient horns curl round its shrunken temples. Medea cuts its scrawny throat with her Thessalian knife, staining the blade (even though the creature has hardly any blood), and then she stuffs the creature’s body in a hollow cauldron, which also holds her potent magic juice. This shrinks its body’s limbs and melts the horns, and with those horns its years dissolve away. From the middle of the cauldron they can hear a soft bleating noise, and then, right away, while they are wondering about the sound, a lamb jumps out and runs away to play and find its mother’s udder for some milk. The daughters of Pelias are amazed. And now Medea’s promises have shown she can be trusted, they encourage her even more eagerly to work her magic.

Phoebus had led his horses from their yoke three times, after completing their descent into the Iberian sea. ¹ On the fourth night brilliant stars were shining as Medea, Aeetes’ deceitful daughter, set out on a blazing fire pure water and herbs (but ones which had no healing potency). King Pelias and the guards escorting him by now were fast asleep, bodies stretched out and relaxed, like corpses. Medea’s spells and magic powers had put them in that state.

¹The Iberian Sea is the expanse of water beyond the Mediterranean (i.e., the Atlantic Ocean).
The daughters, following her instructions, accompanied the Colchian sorceress into the room where Pelias was sleeping and stood there, grouped around the royal bed. Medea said:

“Why are you so listless? Why hold back now? Unsheathe those swords of yours, let his old fluids out, so I can fill his empty veins with youthful blood! You hold your father’s life and age in your own hands. If you have any loving feelings for him, if those hopes which spur you are not empty, carry out this action for your father. Use your weapons to chase away old age, and, with one slash of those swords you hold, drain his corrupted blood.”

Urged on by these words, both daughters, because they love their father, for the first time set aside their duty. In order to avoid irreverence, they act in a most irreverent way. Still, neither one can watch the stab she makes. They avert their eyes, turn their heads away, and with brutal hands blindly stab their father. Blood pours from the old man, who lifts himself up on his elbows, half cut to pieces, and tries to leave the bed. Stretching pale arms out into the middle of so many swords, he cries out:

“Daughters, what are you doing? Why take up arms against your father’s life?”

Their courage and their strength abandon them. Pelias is about to speak more words, but Medea cuts off all further speech. She slits his throat. His mutilated corpse she then dumps in the seething cauldron.

Medea would not have escaped punishment, if she had not moved up into the air with her winged dragons, flying way up high over shady Pelion, Chiron’s home, over Othrys, and areas made famous by what happened once to old Cerambus, who, when solid earth was inundated by flooding seas, with the nymphs’ assistance flew into the air on wings and was not drowned, and thus escaped Deucalion’s flood.¹ Moving past Aetolian Pitane on her left,
with its stone replica of a dragon,
and the grove of Ida, in which Bacchus, using the deceptive image of a stag,
once concealed a bullock stolen by his son,
she passed the place where Corythus’s father lies interred in shallow sand and those fields where the eerie sound of Maera’s barking makes men afraid.² She travelled on past Cos, Eurypylus’ city, where the women acquired horns at the time when Hercules and his soldiers left the island, past Rhodes, Apollo’s city, and the Telchines of Ialysos, whose eyes polluted everything they saw. Sickened by their deeds, Jupiter drowned them in his brother’s waves.
She moved across the walls of Carthaea in ancient Ceos, where Alcidamas, a father, was amazed a gentle dove could fly up out of his daughter’s body.³ From there she looked down on Hyrië’s lake and Cycneian Tempe, which gained its fame overnight, thanks to a swan. In that spot, Philius had given some birds to Cycnus,

¹Chiron was a centaur (half man, half horse) famous for his wisdom. Cerambus was changed into beetle and flew to the top of Mount Parnassus to prevent being drowned during the great flood. For Ovid’s story of Deucalion and the Flood, see Book 1.

²Aetolian Pitane is in Asia Minor. The grove of Ida is near Troy. When Bacchus’s son, Thyoneus, stole an ox, Bacchus changed the animal into a stag in order to protect his son from the farmers pursuing him. Corythus’ father was Paris of Troy. Maera was a dog, perhaps once a human female, now transformed. Some commentators believe the name refers to Hecuba, queen of Troy, who is changed into a dog (for her story see Book 13).

³Eurypylus was a king of Cos, an island in the Aegean sea. The women of Cos were changed into cows when they angered the gods. In one version of the story, the gods were displeased because the women abused Hercules when he drove cattle across the island. The Telchines were the original inhabitants of Rhodes. Ialysos is a town on Rhodes. Jupiter’s brother is Neptune, god of the sea. Carthaea is a city on the island of Ceos in the Aegean. Alcidamas had a daughter who gave birth to a dove.
along with a wild lion he had tamed, as the young lad Cycnus had instructed. Cycnus then asked him to subdue a bull, and Philius did so, but was upset his love had been rebuffed so many times and refused to give the bull to Cycnus as his final gift, although he begged him. Cycnus in his anger cried out to him:

“You’re going to wish you’d given me that bull.”

Then he jumped down from a towering rock. They all believed he’d fallen to his death, but he was changed into a swan and soared on snow-white wings high up into the air. His mother, Hyrië, who was unaware he had survived, dissolved in her own tears and turned into the lake that bears her name.¹

Pleuron lies adjacent to these places. Here Combe, Ophis’ daughter, had escaped being hurt by her own sons, by flying away on trembling wings. After that, Medea gazed down on Calaurea’s fields, sacred to Latona, knowing their king and queen had once changed into birds.² Cyllene lay off to her right, where Menephron one day would, like a savage animal, have sex with his own mother. Far away from there she saw Cephisus mourning his grandson’s fate, changed by Apollo to a bloated seal, and the house where Eumelus was grieving for his son, now a creature of the air.³

Finally, with her winged dragons she reached Ephyre, home of the Pirenian spring, where people in the olden days would claim that in the earliest ages human bodies were created out of rain-soaked mushrooms.

¹This is the second story involving the transformation of someone called Cycnus into a swan (for the first see 2.530 ff.). A third one occurs at 12.228.
²Calaurea is an island close to the Peloponnese.
³Eumelus killed his son, but Apollo changed the boy into a bird.
Here, after Jason’s new bride was consumed by Medea’s drugs and both seas had seen the royal palace burning, Medea profanely bathed her sword in her sons’ blood. After this appalling act of vengeance, she fled, avoiding Jason’s armed response.¹

Borne from there on her Titanic dragons she came to Athens, city of Pallas, which had once seen you, most worthy Phene, and you, too, old Periphas, both flying, and the granddaughter of Polypemon bearing herself aloft on strange new wings.² Aegeus took her in (and should be condemned for that one act alone), but welcoming her was not enough. He also joined himself to her, and she became his wife.

And now

Aegeus’ son, Theseus, whom his father had never known, reached Athens.³ His courage had pacified the Isthmus between both seas. Medea, in an attempt to kill him, mixed a strong poison she had brought with her from Scythian shores. They say this venom came from the teeth of Echidna’s dog child, Cerberus.⁴ There is a hidden cavern with a gloomy opening and a trail leading down to Hades. Along this path Hercules, hero from Tiryns, had dragged Cerberus off in adamantine chains.⁵

---

¹Jason married the daughter of the king of Ephyre (an ancient name for Corinth, which stood on the Isthmus and had seas on either side of its territory). Medea, seeking revenge for his infidelity, sent the new bride a poisoned tiara and dress which ate away her flesh, and she died in agony. The king of Corinth died from the poison, as well, and the palace burned down. Then Medea killed both sons she and Jason had had together.

²Phene was the wife of Periphas, a mythological king of Athens who was changed into a bird by Jupiter. The granddaughter of Polypemon, Alcyone, was changed into a kingfisher (for Ovid’s treatment of her story see Book 11).

³Before coming to Athens, Aegeus had left his wife pregnant in another city, telling her that if she had a son to send him when the boy was strong enough to lift a certain stone and take out the shoes and sword hidden under it. Hence, he has not yet seen Theseus.

⁴Echidna is a famous monster, who gave birth to a number of other monsters, including Cerberus, the triple-headed dog guarding Hades.

⁵Hercules took the dog from Hades as one of his famous labours.
The beast fought back, twisting his eyes sideways, away from daylight and the sunshine. Roused to savage fury, its three throats had howled, all at once, filling the air with barking and showering green fields with foam-white drool. This, so men believe, hardened and, nourished by fertile and productive soil, acquired a noxious power. Because it is long lived and springs up on solid rock, country folk have named it aconite. Through his wife’s deceit, Aegeus, the father, gave his own son this poison, as if he were his enemy. Theseus, suspecting nothing, took the cup his father offered him in his right hand. But when Aegeus recognized the signs of his own family on the ivory hilt of ‘Theseus’ sword, he knocked the poisoned cup from his son’s mouth. Medea fled from death in a mist produced by her enchantments.

Although Aegeus was overjoyed his son had not been injured, he was still amazed such a wicked crime could be attempted and come within a hair’s breadth of success. He lit fires on altars and heaped up gifts for the gods. His axes struck the brawny necks of oxen whose horns were bound with ribbon. People assert that no day ever shone on Erectheus’ city more joyfully than that day. Senior men and common folk maintain the festival. They sing songs, too, and wine inspires their happy festive mood:

“O mighty Theseus, praised in Marathon for shedding the blood of that bull from Crete, for making farmers safe from that wild boar when they plough their fields in Cromyon. Your actions killed them both. That was your gift. And thanks to you, the land of Epidaurus

---

1 Aconite (also called Wolfsbane) is a plant which is poisonous to human beings.
2 Marathon is a town near Athens, which was threatened by a bull brought into the region by Hercules. Cromyon is a village near Corinth which had to cope with a destructive wild boar. Theseus killed both beasts.
saw the club-wielding son of Vulcan fall.
The banks of Cephisus watched you as you killed the cruel Procrustes, and Eleusis, sacred to Ceres, saw Cercyon die. You also did away with Sinis, too, whose massive strength committed evil deeds. He used to bend pine trees and bring their tops down to the ground when he wished to strew his victims’ corpses far and wide. And the roads to where Leleges live in Megara are now secure, for you disposed of Scyron, and earth and sea deny a resting place for this robber’s scattered bones, which, men say, have been for such a long time tossed around, old age has hardened them to solid rocks which carry Scyron’s name.¹ And if we wished to count your worthy honours and your years, your noble deeds would be more numerous. Bravest of men, for you we offer up our public prayers. To honour you we drain our drinks of wine.”

The royal palace echoed people’s shouts and their supporting prayers, and in the city everyone rejoiced.

But Aegeus’ joy at welcoming his son is not complete (for, in fact, no pleasure ever lasts—some worry always interferes with our delight). Minos is preparing to wage war. He has a strong force of troops and ships, but his most powerful weapon is a father’s anger, for he is seeking, through this war, a just revenge for the death of his son Androgeus.² But first of all, he gathers allied forces for the fight ¹These are the names of famous robbers whom Theseus killed. Vulcan’s son mentioned here was Periphetes, notorious for his club. Procrustes would stretch people out or cut off their extremities so that they fit his bed. Cercyon used to challenge people to wrestle him. He would kill them if they refused or if he beat them. Sinis used to tie victims to pine trees he bent down to earth so that, when he let go, they would be catapulted a long way. Scyron forced people to wash his feet on rocks by the sea. Then he would kick them into the sea, where a tortoise ate their bodies.

²Minos was king of Crete. His son Androgeus was killed in Athens because he won every prize at a contest sponsored by Aegeus.
and crosses the sea with the rapid fleet which makes him powerful. Then Anaphe joins Minos’ force, swearing an alliance, and the realm of Astypalaea, too, once he has overpowered it in war, then after that low-lying Myconos, the chalky island of Cimolus, Scyros (where thyme grows everywhere), flat Seriphos, and Paros, too, rich in marble, and Siphnos, which treacherous Arne betrayed to him, once she was paid in gold to feed her greed.¹ For that she was transformed into a jackdaw, a bird with feet and feathers coloured black, which even now is still obsessed with gold. But Oliaros, Didyme, Tenos, Andros, Gyros, and Peparethos, where shining olives grow abundantly, did not assist the Cretan fleet.² Minos, moving north from there, made for Oenopia, the Aeacidaean realm. Ancient peoples called it Oenopia, but Aeacus himself named it Aegina after his own mother.

A crowd rushes down, keen to see the man who is so famous. Telamon comes out to meet him with his brother Peleus (younger than Telamon) and the third son, Phocus.³ Aeacus comes himself, as well, but slowed down by the weight of his old age, and asks Minos the reason for his visit. The ruler of one hundred cities sighs, remembering his sorrow for his son, and answers him:

“I’m asking for your help in a war for the sake of my own son. You will be part of a pious action. I’m asking that he have a burial mound, something that will give me consolation.”

The grandson of Asopus said to Minos:

¹The names here indicate islands close to Crete.
²Oliaros, Tenos, Andros, Gyros are islands in the Aegean Sea.
³These three brothers are the sons of Aeacus, king of Aegina.
“Your request is futile. What you require my city cannot do. There is no land more closely tied to the Athenians than this one. We ratified a treaty.”

Minos was not pleased. He went away, saying:

“That pact of yours will cost you a great deal.”

He thought it more practical to threaten war than to fight and squander his resources prematurely in that place.

Cretan ships could still be seen from Aegina’s battlements when a ship from Athens, all sails flying, came rushing into view and moved inside the harbor of its ally. She carried Cephalus, as well as a commission from his native land. Many years had passed since those sons of Aeacus had seen him, but they recognized him, clasped his right hand, and then went with him to their father’s house. The well-known hero, still showing traces of his earlier beauty, went inside, with an olive branch he brought from Athens. As an older man, he had beside him, to his left and right, two more youthful men Clytos and Butes, both sons of Pallas. After some initial conversation, Cephalus summed up, in brief, the orders he had received from the Athenians and asked for help, mentioning the treaty and the oaths their ancestors had taken and adding that Minos was intending to conquer all Achaea. While saying this, his eloquence reinforced the reasons for the orders he had brought from Athens.

---

1According to some accounts Cephalus was the son of Mercury and Herse, the daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens. Hence, Cecrops was Cephalus’s grandfather.

2The Pallas mentioned here was a member of the royal family in Athens. The reference is not to Pallas Athena.
BOOK SEVEN

Aeacus, his left hand on the handle of his shining sceptre, said:

“Athenian, do not ask for our assistance. Help yourself. Do not hesitate to take the forces which this island now possesses as your own. We do not lack resources (may this state of my affairs continue!). I command sufficient soldiers and, thanks to the gods, this is a prosperous moment, no time to make excuses.”

Cephalus replied:

“May things remain that way and the number of your citizens keep growing. Indeed, just now, as I arrived, I was delighted to come across so many younger folk, all so good looking. And yet I did miss many of those people I saw earlier, when I was welcomed here into your city.”

Aeacus sighed and in a sombre voice replied as follows:

“After a bad start a better fortune follows. How I wish I could tell you about just one of them without the other! But now I’ll go through what happened in the order it occurred and won’t detain you with long-winded chat. Those people you remember in your mind and asked about are now just bones and ash. A huge part of my resources perished, when a dreadful plague fell on the people, brought about by Juno’s envious rage. How she despised a land named for her rival! As long as it looked like human illness and the harmful cause of so many deaths was hidden, we used our medical skills to fight against it. But the destruction swamped our efforts, which simply did not work, once we were overwhelmed. When it started, sky blanketed the earth in a thick fog and with its clouds held in a stifling heat, and while the moon joined up her horns four times to complete her orb and then four times waned, reducing her full sphere, hot southern winds kept blowing lethal blasts. We can confirm the sickness even reached our springs and lakes. Thousands of snakes crept over untilled fields, poisoning our rivers with their venom. The power of this unexpected plague first revealed itself to us by killing off dogs, birds, sheep, cattle, and wild animals. The wretched ploughman was amazed to see his sturdy oxen fall down as they toiled, collapsing in the middle of the furrow, and while flocks of sheep gave out sickly bleats, their wool fell off, all on its own, as their bodies were consumed. The lively horse, once famous on the track, dishonoured its victories, forgot its previous triumphs, and, now doomed to a lingering death, groaned in its stall. Wild boars lost any sense of their own fury, deer had no confidence in their own speed, and bears did not attack strong herds of cattle. They were all listless. Decaying bodies lay in the woods, fields, and roads, and the air was putrid with the stench. And what was strange was that dogs, ravenous birds, and gray wolves would not touch the corpses. They died and rotted, while their noxious vapours spread contagion far and wide. As it grew more destructive, the fatal illness reached unlucky farmers and in the major cities gained control inside the walls. First, the inner organs got very hot. Then these hidden inner flames produced a reddish skin, and drawing breath grew difficult. Tongues were rough and swollen, men’s mouths were parched, their breathing shallow. They lay there, open mouthed, dry throats gasping poisonous air. The sick could not endure staying in bed or having covers on.

---

1Aegina, the island, was named after the nymph who was carried there by Jupiter. She was the mother of Aeacus. Jupiter was his father.
They lay down with their chests against hard ground. But the earth did not cool off their bodies. Instead, their bodies heated up the earth. No one could stop it. Savage destruction broke out even among physicians, too, and those who tried to use their healing skills just harmed themselves. The closer people got to ailing patients and the more faithfully they nursed the sick, the sooner they would join those who had died. And when men lost all hope for any cure and realized their sickness would end in death, they followed their desires and were not interested in what might help, since nothing seemed to work. So everywhere people abandoned any sense of shame. They clung to springs, wells, and streams. But drinking did not quench their thirst, not before their lives were over. Many of them were so ill, they could not stand up. They even died there, right in the water. Then some other patient would come and drink. The desperately sick found the beds they hated so unpleasant, they would get up and, if they lacked the strength to stand upright, would roll their bodies out along the ground. And people all ran off, leaving their household gods, in the belief their homes were deadly. They had no idea what brought on the disease, and so they thought the place must be at fault. You could see some roaming the streets, half dead, if they still had strength enough to stand, and others lying on the earth, weeping, rolling their spent eyes as they lay there dying. They stretched their arms to the stars in heaven high above them, breathing their last here and there, wherever death had overtaken them.

How did I feel throughout all this? What one would expect. I hated life and wished to be a part of my own people. Wherever my eyes would turn to look, there were piles of bodies, like rotten apples which have fallen down from moving branches or acorns dropping from a shaken oak. You see that temple across from you, on top of those long stairs?
It belongs to Jupiter. Who did not bring his useless offerings to those altars?
How many times did a husband praying for his wife or a father for his son perish at the unavailing altars, with the unused portion of the incense still in his hand for anyone to find? [590] How often did the sacrificial bulls brought to the temple suddenly fall down without a wound, while the priest was praying and pouring unmixed wine between its horns!
When I was personally conducting a sacrifice to Jupiter for myself, my three sons, and my country, the victim gave a wretched groan and unexpectedly collapsed without receiving any blow.
Its blood left hardly any stains on knives
we thrust into its belly. Its entrails, full of disease, had lost all indications of the truth and of warnings from the gods.¹
The deadly working of that pestilence moved deep within, right to inner organs.
I saw dead bodies by the sacred doors and at the very altars, thrown down there, so the deaths were even more offensive.²
Some people used a noose to end their lives and by dying escaped the fear of death, quite willing to bring on their looming fate.
Bodies of the dead were not sent away with any of the customary rites (the city gates could not accommodate the funerals). They lay there on the ground unburied or were simply thrown away on lofty burial sites. For by this time no reverence remained. People quarreled about the pyres, and dead bodies were burned in flames prepared for someone else. No one [610]

¹Inspecting the entrails of sacrificial animals for prophetic omens was an important element in many sacrifices.
²The gods found dead bodies repugnant. Placing corpses by the temples and altars was thus, one assumes, meant to encourage them to intervene and halt the disease.
was left to weep, and the souls of children and parents, of the young and old, wandered unlamented. Places used for burials had no space or wood for funeral fires.
Overwhelmed by such a huge storm of despair,
I cried out:

‘O Jupiter, if those stories about you are not false when people say Aegina, daughter of Asopus, held you in her arms and if, O mighty father, you are not ashamed to be my parent,
give me back my people, or else put me
with them in a common burial mound.’

He offered me a sign with flashing lightning
THE MYRMIDONS
and another with his thunder. I said:

‘I take these omens you have given me as pledges. I accept them, and I pray they indicate your favour and signal what you mean to do.’

Now, it so happened
that close beside me stood an oak tree sacred to Jupiter, whose seed had come from his holy temple at Dodona.
Its branches were spread out and thinly spaced.¹
Here I observed some ants collecting grain in a long column, carrying big loads in tiny mouths, and following a track across the wrinkled bark. I was amazed how numerous they were, and so I said:

‘O best of fathers, give me this many citizens and restock my empty walls.’

The tall oak trembled, and its branches moved.
Although there was no wind, they made a sound.
My limbs were quivering, shaking with fear, and my hair stood up on end. But I kissed ¹Dodona, the site of a major shrine to Zeus, had a famous oak tree which played a major role in the oracle there.

the earth and the oak, not yet admitting there was any hope, and yet it gave me hope.
I kept my cherished wishes in my heart.
Then, as night came on, sleep took possession of my body, worn out with so much care,
and the same oak tree appeared to be there,
before my eyes, with just as many branches,
just as many creatures in those branches,
all quivering the way they did before,
and shaking that row of ants collecting grain down to the ground below. Then these creatures suddenly grew, looking larger and larger,
and raised themselves to stand up on the ground, bodies now erect. They lost their slender shape, their numerous feet, and their black colour.
Their limbs then altered into human forms.
Sleep left. Once awake, I dismissed the dream, complaining I had got no help at all from gods above. But inside the palace there was a noisy sound of people talking.
It seemed to me I could hear men’s voices (and by this time I was not used to that).
I assumed these sounds were still part of my dream,
as well, but Telamon came running up, threw open the doors, and shouted:

‘Father!
Come outside! There are things to see out here beyond belief, beyond what you could hope!’

I went outside and there I saw some men like those I’d seen as images in sleep, arranged in lines in a similar way,
and one I recognized. They came to me and hailed me as their king. I carried out my oath to Jupiter, dividing up the city and its fields, now quite empty of farmers who had worked in them before, among the people who had just arrived.
I called them Myrmidons, which I derived from myrmex, meaning ant, a name I chose because it fit those people’s origins.¹
You have seen their bodies. They still follow the customs they once had in earlier times and are a thrifty people, hard working, striving tenaciously for what they want,
and hanging on to what they get. These men, whose spirits match their age, will follow you to war, once that favourable east wind which brought you here veers to the south.”

And, in fact,
an eastern wind had helped him reach the place.

With these and other stories the two men filled a lengthy day. The last part of the light they spent feasting, and when night came they slept.
The golden Sun brought forth his light once more,
but East Wind was still blowing, holding back
the ships which meant to sail for home that day.
Pallas’ two sons met up with Cephalus,
a more senior man, and the three of them went to meet the king. But he was still asleep.
Phocus, a son of Aeacus, met them at the door (Telamon and his brother were mustering men for war), escorted the Athenians inside the palace, to a beautiful, secluded spot, and there they sat together. Then Phocus noticed that Cephalus held in his hand a spear with a golden point, made out of a wood he had not seen before. So as they spoke their first few words, Phocus interrupted what they were saying to ask about the spear:

“I have a good knowledge of the forests and of hunting animals, but for some time I’ve been curious about what kind of wood is in the shaft of that spear you’re holding.
If it were ash, surely it would be brown.
If made of cornel wood, it would have knots.
I have no idea where it might come from,

¹I have added the phrase about the derivation of the name from the Greek word in order to clarify the reason the name suits their origins.
but my eyes have never seen a weapon more beautifully designed for throwing.”

One of the Athenian brothers answered:

“With this spear you will be more astonished by its effectiveness than by its looks.
No matter where it’s aimed, it strikes its target.
Once it is thrown, no chance affects its path,
and it flies back on its own, stained with blood.
No one needs to run and get it.”

This reply
made Phocus eager to learn more. He asked all sorts of questions. Why was the spear like this?
Where did it come from? Who had given him such a wondrous gift? Cephalus answered what he asked, but was still ashamed to state what he had paid for it. He fell silent.
Moved by a sense of grief for his lost wife,
he felt tears welling up and said these words:

“Son of a goddess, this spear makes me weep
(who could believe that!), and if Fates grant me a lengthy life, this same effect you see will be produced for many years to come.
This weapon finished me and my dear wife.
How I wish I’d never had this present!
My wife was Procris, sister of that girl who was carried away, Orithyia.
Though Orithyia is one your ears are far more likely to have heard about,
if you wanted to compare the two of them for looks and manners, Procris was the one more worth abducting.¹ King Erechtheus, her father, joined her to me in marriage, and love linked us, as well. People called me a happy man, and I was. But to the gods that is not how things appeared. Otherwise
I would perhaps be happy even now.
The second month after our marriage rites, bright Aurora was chasing off the night

¹For Ovid’s treatment of the abduction of Orithyia by Boreas see above 6.1100 ff.
and caught sight of me from the topmost peak of Mount Hymettus, where flowers always bloom, while I was putting nets in place to catch wild deer with horns.\footnote{Mount Hymettus was in Attica.} She carried me away against my will. By the goddess’s grace, I may speak the truth. Though she is lovely with her rosy face, though she looks after border regions of the light and darkness, though she feeds herself on liquid nectar, I loved Procris. Procris was in my heart. Procris was always on my lips. I kept talking about our sacred marriage couch, the recent consummation of our love, our wedding held just a short time before, and the prior rights of our empty bed. The goddess grew annoyed and said to me:

‘Stop your complaining, you ungrateful man. Keep your Procris! But if my mind can see into the future, you are going to wish you did not have her!’

Still very angry, she sent me back to Procris. On my way home, mulling in my heart what the goddess said, I began to fear my wife might have betrayed our marriage vows. Her youth and loveliness forced me to think of infidelity, but her virtue told me to place no trust in thoughts like that. Still, I had been away, I was returning home from a woman who exemplified that fault, and lovers are afraid of everything. So I chose to explore a thing that might be painful—to test her faithful chastity with gifts. Aurora encouraged my anxieties and changed the way I looked (it seemed to me I could feel her doing it). I went back to Athens, city of Pallas—no one knew who I was—and entered my own home. In the house itself nothing was amiss. It showed signs that everyone was faithful. and worried that their master was not there. It was hard for me to come face to face with Erectheus’ daughter—I had to use a thousand ploys. But when I did meet her, I was astonished and almost gave up my plans to test her constancy. In fact, I found it difficult to keep myself from telling her the truth and difficult not kissing her the way I should have done. She was grieving (but no woman could be more beautiful than she was in her grief), suffering with longing for her husband, who had been snatched away. Phocus, just think what sort of beauty that woman possessed who looked so lovely even in her sorrow! Why should I describe for you how often her chaste manners spurned my invitations, how often she said:

‘I am committed to one man alone, wherever he is.
The pleasure I can give I keep for him.’

What husband in his senses would not find that test of her fidelity sufficient? But I was not content. I battled on to wound myself, until, by promising to confer a fortune on her for one night and then increasing the amount, at last I forced her to relent. By these false means I won the day and cried:

‘You evil woman,
this adultery is merely a pretense!
You traitor, I am your real husband
You have been caught, and I have witnessed it!’

She said nothing. Overwhelmed with silent shame, she ran away from her deceitful home and her wretched husband. Resenting me, hating the whole race of men, she wandered in the mountains, basing her way of life on the customs of divine Diana. Now I was alone, and a fiercer flame burned in my bones. I pleaded for forgiveness, conceding I was wrong and confessing I, too, if offered gifts, could have committed such a fault, if such generous presents had been proposed. When I admitted this, at first she punished me for disrespect, since I had injured her, and then came back. We spent sweet years, living in harmony. As if, in giving herself, she had given a trifling present, she also offered me the gift of a dog which she had once received from her own goddess Cynthia, who said:

‘He will surpass all other hounds in running.’

At the same time she offered me this spear, which, as you can see, my hand is holding. Would you like to learn about what happened to the dog, that other gift? Then listen to an astounding story. You will be stirred by the amazing details of the tale.

With his own intelligence, Oedipus, son of Laius, had deciphered those songs which no one else had understood before, and that mysterious prophetess, the Sphinx, had collapsed and lay there, her riddling words forgotten. But, of course, nurturing Themis does not let such things go without revenge. Immediately she sent another scourge against Aonian Thebes. Many farmers feared the wild beast would destroy their cattle and kill them, too. We young men of the town all came and closed off our extensive fields inside a cordon. But the quick creature, with an easy leap, overcame our nets and moved across the tops of traps we set. We unleashed the dogs. The wild beast ran off

---

1 Oedipus solved the riddle of the Sphinx and thus destroyed the Sphinx and saved Thebes from a deadly plague.

2 Ovid does not indicate precisely what the “scourge” or the “wild beast” was. In traditional accounts of the story it was a monstrous female fox (called the Teumessian fox, after a city in Boeotia, or the Cadmean vixen).
with the hounds in hot pursuit, but its speed, no slower than a bird in flight, mocked them. So then with one loud voice they all begged me to untie Laelaps (the name of the dog my wife had given me). By now this hound for some time had been pulling at his leash, straining his neck to shake off all restraints. As soon as we had sent him on his way, we could no longer tell where he might be. He left traces of warm footprints in the dust, but he himself had vanished from our eyes. No spear could fly more quickly than that dog, no pellet hurled from any twisted sling, nor any arrow from a Cretan bow.

A hill stood in the middle of the plain, the top of which looked down on land below. I went up there to watch the spectacle of this curious race, where at one moment the wild beast looked as if it had been caught, and at another seemed to pull away without a scratch. The crafty animal, as it raced across the ground, did not keep to a straight line, but escaped the muzzle of the pursuing dog by circling round, so its enemy could not launch a charge. The dog stayed close, kept up a similar pace, seemed to catch it, but did not have a grip—his empty snapping fanned the air in vain.

I turned to use my spear. While hefting it in my right hand, trying to fit my fingers in the throwing strap, I turned my eyes away. Then I brought them back to the selfsame spot. I looked and saw something incredible—two statues in the middle of the plain, made of marble! You could well imagine one was running away, the other one pursuing. It was clear that if some god was with those animals, he wanted both of those contestants to remain unbeaten.”

Cephalus ended that part of his tale and said no more. Phocus asked:
“And that spear—
what has it done wrong?”

Cephalus then told him about the crimes committed by the spear:

“Phocus, my sad story begins with joy, and I will talk of that part first. O son of Aeacus, I get such great delight remembering the blessed times we had, when in our early years I had the luck to live in such content with my dear wife, and she was happy with her husband, too. With love we shared all mutual concerns. She would not have chosen Jupiter’s bed before my love, and there was no woman who could capture me, not even Venus, if she had come in person. Equal fires burned in both our hearts. Like an eager youth, it was my custom to go out hunting just as the sun’s first rays shone on the hills. I would have no servants following me, no horses, no keen-nosed hunting dogs, no knotted nets. My safety was my spear. But after my right hand had had enough of slaughtering wild beasts, I would go back into the cool shade where a breeze blew in from colder valleys. When it was really hot, I’d seek that soothing breeze or wait for it as a way of resting after my hard work. I remember how I used to sing:

‘Aura,’

(that was the name I used to call the breeze)

‘come, you most pleasurable one, bring me your sweet delight, come here into my heart, and of your own free will relieve this heat which I find so oppressive!”

---

1In the Latin text, the point of the story which follows depends upon the word aura, meaning breeze, which, because of its feminine gender and its final vowel, could be confused with a woman’s name as soon as Cephalus personifies the breeze and starts talking to it. For that reason, I have retained the Latin word aura
And perhaps I’d add more coaxing words (as my fate led me on), and I may have grown accustomed to repeat:

‘You are my great delight. You refresh me, cherish me, and make me love the woodlands and these solitary places. Your breath is always trapped inside these lips of mine.’

Someone overheard me (I don’t know who), misunderstood my ambiguous words, and assumed the name I called so often belonged to a nymph called Aura. He thought I was in love with her. This rash witness to an imagined crime at once went off to Procris and, in whispers, let her know what he had heard. Love is a credulous thing. They told me she collapsed in instant pain and fainted. A long time later she came to, said she felt sad about her evil fate, and complained about my lack of loyalty. Upset by bad acts which did not take place, her fears were empty. She dreaded a name which had no body. The poor woman grieved as though she had a genuine rival. But often she had doubts and, as she grieved, she entertained the hope that she was wrong, saying she did not trust the evidence and would not denounce her husband for a crime, unless she had witnessed it in person. The following day, when Aurora’s light had pushed away the darkness, I set off, heading for the woods. Once I had hunted with some success, I lay down on the grass and called:

‘Come, Aura—ease my aching limbs.’

Suddenly, as I was saying these words, it seemed to me I heard a certain moaning—

__________________________
in some places, rather than using the English word breeze. I have added the line in brackets to clarify the point.
I had no idea what it might be—but still I called:

‘Come here, my most delightful one!’

Fallen leaves lightly rustled in reply.

I thought a wild creature must be in there and let fly with my spear. It was Procris. With a wound in the middle of her breast, she cried:

‘Alas! I’m hurt!’

Once I heard the voice of my loyal wife, I rushed out and, in a frantic state, charged towards it. I found her half-alive, her clothes all torn and stained with blood, and (to my great grief) she was tugging at the spear stuck in her wound, the gift she’d given me. In gentle arms I picked up the body that I cherished more than my own. I bound the cruel wound by ripping up the clothing on her chest. I tried to stanch the flow of blood and begged her not to abandon me and with her death make me a criminal. As she lost strength and was about to die, she forced herself to utter these few words:

‘I implore you, as a suppliant, by our marriage bonds, by my own household gods and those above, by any good you owe for what I’ve done, and by what has occasioned my own death, that love which even now, as I lie dying, still lives, do not marry that nymph Aura! Do not let her share our marriage bed!’

She ended. Then I finally understood how Aura’s name had led to her mistake. I told her. But how could informing her be any help at all? She began to fail. What little strength she had was leaving her, as her blood flowed out. While she was able to look at anything, she looked at me, and her unhappy spirit she breathed out on me and on my lips. But she did seem to be quite free from worry as she died, with a more tranquil look upon her face.”

The hero shed tears as he told this tale, and his listeners wept, as well. And then, lo and behold, king Aeacus arrived with his two other sons, along with soldiers they had just gathered, all heavily armed.
These Aeacus then gave to Cephalus.
BOOK VIII

[Cephalus returns to Athens; Minos attacks Megara; Scylla falls in love with Minos; Scylla cuts her father’s lock of hair and takes it to Minos; Minos rejects her, conquers the city, and leaves; Scylla is changed into a bird; Minos has Daedalus build the labyrinth for the Minotaur; Theseus kills the Minotaur with Ariadne’s help and abandons her on Dia; Bacchus changes Ariadne’s crown into a constellation; Daedalus makes wings for himself and Icarus; Icarus falls to his death; Daedalus and Perdix; Perdix is changed into a bird; Diana sends a destructive wild boar against Calydon; Meleager assembles a group of hunters; Atalanta’s arrow hits the boar; Meleager kills the boar and awards a prize to Atalanta; Plexippus and Toxeus are killed by Meleager; Althaea avenges the death of her brothers by burning the log that determines Meleager’s life; Calydon mourns Meleager; Meleager’s sisters are changed to birds; Theseus is entertained by Acheloüs, who tells him the story of the Echinades islands and Perimele; Lelex tells the story of Philemon and Baucis, who welcomed Jupiter and Mercury and were changed to trees; Acheloüs tells the story of Erysichthon, who chopped down Ceres’ sacred tree; Ceres’ gets Hunger to infect Erysichthon; Erysichthon sells his daughter Maestra, but Neptune transforms her; Erysichthon eats himself.]

Now, after Lucifer dismissed the night, unveiling a brilliant day, East Wind died down, moist clouds blew in, and a welcome South Wind gave Cephalus and Aeacus’s sons their way of getting back.¹ Thanks to that wind, which kept them on a favourable course, they reached the harbour they were heading for sooner than expected. In the meantime, Minos was laying waste Lelegian lands along the coast. Before attempting that, he tried to test his army’s fighting strength in an attack on Megara, where Nisus ruled. Now, on top of his illustrious head, amid the white hairs there, Nisus possessed a lock distinguished by its purple colour. The security of his great kingdom depended on that lock of purple hair.

The horns of the waxing moon had risen six times, and still the outcome of the war was hanging in the balance. For a long time ¹Cephalus is returning to his city, Athens. The sons of Aeacus, residents of Aegina, are accompanying him, to help deal with the threat from Minos (see the end of Book 7).

Victory hovered between both armies on uncertain wings. A regal tower had been built within the musical walls, where people claimed Apollo, Latona’s son, had placed his golden lyre and where its sound was present in the stone.\(^1\) Nisus’ daughter, Scylla, would often go up to that spot during peacetime and with a small pebble attempt to get some music from the stones. During the war she would also go there, and from the tower look out on the struggles of unyielding battle. Because that war kept going on and on, by now she knew the names of the leading men, their weapons, horses, styles of dress, and Cretan quivers. Before all others, she could recognize their leader’s face—Europa’s son, Minos—whom she knew more about than was required to know just who he was. For if Minos wore on his head a helmet with a plume, she thought the helmet made him so attractive, if he carried his brilliant shield of bronze, he looked so handsome carrying the shield, if his taut muscles hurled a heavy spear, the young girl praised his power and his skill, and when he placed an arrow on his bow and bent the wide arc back, she used to swear that was just how Phoebus Apollo stood, with arrows he had chosen for himself. Whenever Minos took his helmet off to expose his face and, dressed in purple, sat on the back of his white horse, equipped with an ornate saddle, directing it by its foaming bit, Nisus’ virgin child could hardly keep herself under control, hardly stop her mind from going insane. She’d call the spear he touched a happy spear, and happy, too, the reins gripped in his hands. She had an urge (if only she could do it!) to lead her virgin steps through hostile ranks, and felt like hurling her body down there,

\(^{1}\)When king Alcathoüs repaired the walls of Megara, Apollo helped him, and the god’s lyre imparted to the stones some of its musical qualities.
from the very top part of the tower, on to the Cretan camp, or opening the brass gates to the enemy forces, or anything else Minos might desire.
As she sat gazing down on the white tents
of the Cretan king, she said:

“I don’t know
if I should be miserable or happy that this appalling war is going on.
I’m sad that Minos is an enemy of the one who loves him. But if this war had never broken out, I would not know him!
Still, if he were to take me hostage, he could end this war. With me as his companion, he could hold me as a guarantee of peace.
O most beautiful of kings, if the woman who gave birth to you had a face like yours, no wonder Jupiter burned with love for her.¹ O, I would be happy three times over,
if I could travel through the air with wings,
touch down in the camp of the Cretan king, reveal myself, and show my flaming love!
I would ask him what dowry he would want to be won over, with this provision—he would not demand my father’s city.
I would sooner my hopes for marriage die than that I should be able to betray him!
But still, if a peace-loving conqueror is merciful, he often benefits
many of those he has just overwhelmed.
The war he’s fighting for his slaughtered son is clearly just.² His cause and the weapons which defend that cause are very powerful.
And so it seems to me we will be crushed.
If that is to be our city’s destiny,
why should these walls of ours be opened up
by his armed force and not by my own love?
It would be better if he could prevail without killing or delay or shedding his own blood. At least then I would not fear ¹Minos was the son of Jupiter and Europa.

²Minos was avenging his son who had been killed in Athens.
someone might wound your heart by accident, Minos, for who would be so pitiless, he’d dare to aim his cruel spear at you, unless he did not know you? This notion pleases me, and I’ll stand by my resolve to give myself to you, with my country as a dowry, and put an end to war. But wanting to do this is not enough!
A guard stands watching at the entrance way. My father has the keys for all the gates.
In my sorry state, he is the only one I’m scared of, the only one delaying what I desire. O how I wish the gods could arrange things so I had no father! But everyone is really his own god, and Fortune is the foe of idle prayers. By this time, another woman aflame with such great passion would be rejoicing in the ruin of whatever blocked her love. Why should any woman have more courage than I do? I would dare to go through fire and through swords. But this time there is no need for fires or swords. All I need is that lock from my father’s head. To me that purple lock is more valuable than gold. With that hair I will be happy and get what I desire.”

As Scylla was saying these words, night came, great healer of our cares. With the shadows her boldness grows. The early hours of rest have now arrived, when sleep takes possession of hearts exhausted from their daytime cares. She creeps softly into her father’s room, and (alas for such a criminal act!) the daughter steals that fatal lock of hair from her own father. Once she has taken her abominable prize she goes out through the middle of the enemy camp (she has such confidence in the service she is performing) and reaches Minos, who is astonished when she speaks to him, and says:
“Love urged me to commit this crime. I am Scylla, royal child of Nisus, and I am giving you my household gods and my native land. I seek no reward, other than yourself. Take this purple hair as a pledge of love. And trust me in this—I am not offering just a lock of hair, but my father’s head, as well!”

She holds out the gift in her treasonous right hand, but Minos backs away from what she is giving him. Shocked by the thought of her unnatural act, he answers:

“O you disgrace to this age in which we live, may the gods banish you from their world, and may all lands and waters be denied you! I, at least, will not let someone so monstrous come into my world, into Crete, land where Jupiter was born.”

Minos spoke. Then this most just of rulers, once he had imposed laws on the people he had conquered, gave orders to his troops to loosen the ships’ cables, man the oars, and row the bronze-beaked vessels out to sea. When Scylla saw the fleet was setting off, already underway across the waves, she realized their leader would not give her anything to reward her treachery. Since she had no more prayers to offer, her emotions turned to virulent rage. Hair dishevelled, she held out both her hands and, in a frenzy, screamed:

“Where are you running—discarding the one who brought you your success? O you, whom I chose before my country, before my father, where are you fleeing, you heartless man? I deserve the credit for your conquest, which is my crime, as well. Are you not moved by the gift I gave you, or by my love for you, or by the fact that all my hopes now rest on you alone?
If you abandon me, where shall I go?
To my country? It has been overpowered and lies conquered. But even if my land were still intact, it would be closed against me, thanks to my treachery! To my father, whom I betrayed to you? The citizens, for their own good reasons, all despise me,
and neighbours fear me as a bad example.
I have shut myself off from all the world,
so Crete alone would be open to me.
So if you, too, keep me away from you and leave me here, you man without a heart, Europa could not have been your mother,
but rather that inhospitable Syrtis,
or some Armenian tigress, or Charybdis, whipped up by southern winds. And you are not a son of Jupiter, nor was your mother led astray by the image of some bull.¹
That story of your birth is all made up!
Yes, your father was a bull—a wild beast never tamed by love for any heifer!
O Nisos, my father, come punish me!
And you walls which I betrayed, take pleasure from my pain! For I deserve your hatred—
I admit that. And I deserve to die.
But let one of those whom my impiety has harmed destroy me. Why punish my crime, Minos, when it produced your victory?
My criminal act against my father and my country was a kindness to you.
You are certainly a worthy husband for that woman who, with a wooden frame, tricked that bull into adulterous sex and in her womb bore a misshapen child.²
Is anything I say reaching your ears, you ungrateful man, or do the same winds carrying your fleet away also steal

¹Syrtis was a quicksand near the coast of Africa. The tigers of Armenia were famous for their ferocity.
Charybdis was a vicious whirlpool in the sea off Sicily. Jupiter assumed the form of a bull in order to abduct Europa. For Ovid’s treatment of the story see 2.1236 above.
²Pasiphaë, wife of Minos, overwhelmed with lust for a bull sent by Poseidon, had a wooden frame built in the shape of a cow, so she could conceal herself inside and have sex with the animal. The offspring of the union was the Minotaur, a destructive monster, part human, part bull. For Minos’ response see 8.248 below.
these useless words of mine? And now, yes, now I'm not surprised Pasiphaë preferred that bull to you—you're a more savage brute!
How wretched I am! He's ordering them to scurry off, and now waves are hissing to the rhythm of their oars, while my land and I both fade from view. But that won't work!
Your efforts to forget my services will not succeed. I'll be following you, against your will, clutching the curved sternpost
on your ship, dragged far across the ocean.”

Her speech is hardly over when she jumps into the waves and swims after the ships.
Her passion gives her strength to hang on there, to the Cretan vessel, a companion who is not welcome. Her father sees her (he has just been changed to a sea eagle hovering in the air on tawny wings).
He swoops down to tear her into pieces with his hooked beak, as she is clinging there.
Scylla, in terror, lets go of the stern, but as she falls, the gentle breezes seem to hold her so she does not touch the water.
Feathers are growing up out of her arms,
and she is changed into the bird we call Ciris, or the shearer, a name she gets for cutting off her father's lock of hair.¹

As soon as Minos reached the land of Crete, he disembarked. To fulfill a promise he had made to Jupiter, he sacrificed one hundred oxen and hung his trophies in the palace as a decoration.
But he faced a growing family scandal.
The shameful adultery of the queen was obvious from the bizarre nature of her hybrid monster child.² Minos chose to move this disgrace out of his home and to keep it in a complex structure,

¹It is not clear what bird Ovid is referring to. The name Ciris allegedly comes from the Greek work meaning to cut.
²The hybrid monster, as mentioned above, is the Minotaur—half bull, half human.
a labyrinth built with blind passages. Daedalus, a man highly celebrated for his skill in architecture, drew up the plans. With confusing direction marks he led the eye into a wandering maze of various twisting pathways. Just as the playful waters of the Maeander keep changing course, as they flow here and there across the fields in Phrygia and can see the waves upstream moving down towards them, while their uncertain currents sometimes flow to their sources, sometimes to the open sea, that’s how Daedalus designed the pathways, countless wandering passages in the maze. The structure was so hard to navigate, that even Daedalus found it difficult to find his way back to the entry point.¹

In that labyrinth Minos imprisoned the monstrous double shape of bull and man. Twice he fed it blood from young Athenians chosen by lot at nine-year intervals. But the third time he collected tribute, the monster was overcome, for Theseus, son of Aegeus, with the assistance of young Ariadne, Minos’ daughter, by following a thread made his way back on the tricky pathway to the entrance, a trip no one had ever made before. He immediately set sail for Dia, taking Ariadne with him, but then cruelly abandoned his companion on the shore.² The girl, in her isolation, ¹The Maeander river (in Asia Minor) was famous for its many ox-bow curves, in which one section of the river looped around and came very close to an earlier portion of the stream. Thus, the downstream waters could, as it were, observe the water further upstream which would soon occupy their present position. The very curved shape of the river meant that sometimes it looked as if the currents in two adjacent sections were flowing in different directions.

²After Minos defeated Athens, he demanded several young people from the city be shipped to Crete periodically. These he put into the labyrinth, where they were destroyed by the Minotaur. Theseus was part of the third delegation of victims. Ariadne gave him the idea of unwinding a thread as he moved through the labyrinth, so that he could find his way back again. Theseus went in, killed the Minotaur, and followed the thread back to the entrance. Dia is another name for the island of Naxos, where Theseus abandoned Ariadne.
wept bitter tears, but Bacchus embraced her and provided help. Taking off the crown around her head, he set it in the sky, to make her famous as an eternal star. Up through the lighter air it soared aloft and, as it moved, its jewels were transformed to brilliant fires. They settled into place, retaining still the outline of a crown, halfway between the kneeling Hercules and the serpent held by Ophiuchus.¹

Meanwhile, Daedalus had grown frustrated with Crete and his long exile there. He yearned for his own land, but was held back by the sea.² He said:

"Minos may block off land and sea, but surely the sky is open to us— and that’s the route we’ll take. He may control all things, but he does not control the air."

He spoke and then set his mind to thinking of inventions as yet unknown, and thus he changed the course of nature. For he arranged rows of feathers, taking the smallest first and then longer ones laid in sequence, so it looked as if they’d grown out on a slope, like those ancient pipes shepherds used to play, with different reeds which lengthened gradually. Those in the centre he then joined with thread, those at the ends with wax. Once the feathers were assembled in this way, he shaped them into a gentle curve, so they looked like wings of real birds. His son Icarus stood beside him, unaware that the things he touched would put his life in danger. Sometimes he laughed as he caught the feathers shifting around in the wandering breeze ¹Like some other translators, I have supplied the names Hercules and Ophiuchus (“Serpent Bearer”) in order to clarify the astrological reference to the position of the new constellation (Corona Borealis). It is not clear from Ovid’s account where Ariadne’s crown came from.

²Daedalus (who in many legends was an Athenian) had been exiled for murder, and Minos would not let him leave Crete. In some accounts Minos was angry with Daedalus for building the wooden cow which the queen, Pasiphaë, had used to have sex with a bull.
or with his thumb softened the yellow wax and with his playful games kept interrupting his father’s miraculous construction.
When Daedalus had put the final touches on what he had begun, he raised himself into the moving air, balancing his body between a pair of wings. He also gave the following instructions to his son:

“I warn you, Icarus—limit your flight to the region between heaven and earth.
If you go too low, then water vapour will weigh down your wings. If you go too high, fire will burn them. So fly between the two.
And listen. Do not look at Boötes, Helice, or the drawn sword of Orion.
I will guide you. Follow the path I take!”

While Daedalus was telling him the rules of flying, he adjusted the new wings on Icarus’s shoulders. While he worked and issued his advice, the old man’s cheeks were wet, and the father’s hands were trembling.
He kissed his son (he would not kiss him again),
moved upward on his wings, and flew ahead, concerned for his companion. Just as a bird leads her tender chicks out of their high nest into the air, Daedalus keeps encouraging his son to follow, as he demonstrates his skill in the dangerous art of flight.
While moving his own wings, he glances back at the wings of Icarus behind him.
Those who catch sight of them—a man angling for fish with a trembling rod, a shepherd leaning on his staff, or a farmer resting on his plough—are astonished and assume that people who can travel through the sky must be divine.

By now the island Samos,
sacred to goddess Juno, was on their left,

---

1Helice was an alternative name for the constellation of the Great Bear. Boötes was the constellation of the Herdsman.
while Delos and Paros lay behind them, with Lebinthus on their right, along with Calymne, rich in honey. At this point, Icarus started to enjoy the flight, for all its perils, so he left his guide and, filled with a desire to reach heaven, pursued a higher path. His close approach to the fierce Sun softened the fragrant wax which held his wings in place. The wax melted. He flapped his naked arms, but since he had no oar-like wings, he failed to catch the air. While his mouth was screaming his father’s name, his cries were drowned out by the sky-blue sea which takes its name from him. His sad father, now no more a father, shouted:

“Icarus! Where are you, Icarus? Where should I look to find out where you are?”

He kept on calling “Icarus!”

Then he noticed feathers in the waves and cursed his own inventive skills. He buried his son’s body in a tomb in a place whose name became Icaria, after the young lad who was buried there.

As Daedalus was placing the body of his unlucky son inside that tomb, a chattering partridge peering at him from a muddy ditch, flapped its wings and sang to indicate its great delight. Back then, it was the single member of its kind, a bird no one had seen in previous years. It had been created not long before, as an enduring symbol of your shame, Daedalus. For your sister, not knowing what Fate had in store, sent her son to you, so you could teach him. He was twelve years old and had a mind eager for instruction. He was the one who looked at a fish spine and, with that as his model, cut iron to make a solid row of sharpened teeth and came up with the invention of a saw. He was the first to join two metal arms at one central point, so when they were kept a constant distance from each other, one arm stayed in place while the other one traced out a circle. Daedalus, in a jealous fit, threw the boy headlong from the citadel sacred to Minerva and falsely claimed the boy had fallen off. But Minerva, who likes creative minds, gathered him up and changed him to a bird, covering him with feathers in the middle of the air. The inventive energy he once had was transferred to his rapid wings and feet, and he retained the name he had before. But this bird does not raise its body up high in the air or make its nest in branches or in treetops, but flies close to the ground and lays its eggs in hedges, for it recalls that earlier drop and fears high places.

Daedalus, now tired out, is living in the land of Aetna, and Cocalus, responding to his petition for help, has taken up arms and thus earned himself a noble reputation for his kindness. By now, thanks to what Theseus has done, Athens no longer pays that mournful tribute, flowers adorn the temples, and people worship warrior Minerva, Jupiter, and other gods, honouring them with gifts, sacrificial blood, and chests of incense.

---

1In his version of this story Ovid does not give names to the sister or to her son. The latter would, one assumes, be called Perdix, after the Latin for partridge (the bird he is transformed into). In some versions of the story the sister’s name is Perdix and the son’s name is Talus.

2Cocalus, king of Sicily, protected Daedalus from Minos, after the former’s escape from Crete.

3The “mournful tribute,” mentioned previously, was paid to Minos in the form of several young Athenians periodically sent to Crete to be killed by the Minotaur (see line 8.273 above).
Roaming Fame has spread the name of Theseus to every city in Argos, and all those who live in rich Achaea seek his help when great dangers threaten. Of these cities, one is Calydon, which comes to Theseus, as a suppliant, begging him for aid with urgent prayers, even though the place has Meleager on its side.¹ Their appeal is caused by a wild boar sent by Diana, her servant and avenger. She is angry, because king Oeneus, so people say,
after fine harvests in a bumper year,
offered the first fruits of his crops to Ceres, of wine to Bacchus, and of flowing oil
from olives to golden-haired Minerva.
He has paid these ostentatious honours
first of all to the rural deities, and then to all the gods in heaven above.
The story goes that he forgot the altars of Latona’s daughter, the only ones
he ignored and left without their incense.
Rage has its effect, even on the gods.
Diana cried:

“I will not endure this without reprisal. I have not been honoured!
They will not say I did not get revenge.”

To punish the slur, Diana lets loose
a wild boar on Enyeus’s estates, a beast so immense that lush Epirus does not have any bulls that match its size, larger than boars in fields of Sicily.
Blood and fire burn in its eyes, and its neck is rough and stiff, with bristles sticking out like rigid spears, [just like a palisade of thrust-out pikes].² Its grunts are harsh and loud, and hot foam flows down its massive shoulders.
Its tusks are huge, like on an elephant.
Lightning shoots from its mouth, and its breathing

¹Meleager was the son of Oeneus, king of Calydon, in Aetolia (in western Greece).
²Line 286 of the Latin is commonly omitted, since it is considered an interpolation. I have placed the English translation between square brackets.
scorches leaves. Sometimes this beast would trample tender shoots of growing plants, and sometimes ravage a farmer’s full-grown harvest crops, mowing down ears of grain, turning his hopes into despair, while threshing floors and barns would wait in vain for the promised harvests. It scatters heavy clusters on the vine, their budding stems, as well, along with fruit and boughs of always leafy olive trees. It even savages the cattle herds, which nothing can protect, not herdsmen, dogs, or even vicious bulls. Men run away, thinking they are not safe unless they hide inside the city walls.

Then Meleager and a handpicked group of warriors assemble, eager to win fame: twins sons of Tyndarus (Pollux, celebrated for his boxing, and Castor, famous for his horsemanship), Jason (first man to build a ship), Theseus and Pirithoüs (best of friends), two sons of Théstius, Lyceus and swift Ídas (both sons of Aphaíreus), Caèneus (now no longer female), fierce Leucíppus, Acastus (famous for his skill with spears), Hippothoús, Phoenix (Amyntor’s son), Dryas, two sons of Actor, and Phyleus (who comes from Elis). Telamón was there, and Peleus (father of great Achilles), Admetus (Pheres’ son), Ioláüs (a Boeotian), vigorous Eurytion, Echion (unsurpassed in running), Lelex from Locris, Panopeus, Hyleus, fierce Hippasus, Nestor (still in his prime), as well as those sent by Hippócoön from ancient Amyclae, with Laërtes (Penelope’s father-in-law), Ancaeus from Parrhasia, along with Mopsus (Ampyx’s clever son), Amphíaraüs (son of Oeleus, as yet unharmed by his wife’s treachery), and Atalanta, from Tegeae, a girl who was the pride of the Lycaean woods. A polished brooch is fastened on her garment at the top. Her hair is plainly styled and gathered up into a single knot. From her left shoulder an ivory quiver hangs suspended. The arrows in it rattle. Her left hand also holds a bow. From her style of dress and from her face someone could truly say the boy looked like a virgin girl, or else the girl looked like a boy. Meleager, the Calydonian hero, glanced at her and, in that instant, felt a great desire. Although the gods would not permit his love, he swallowed down the hidden flames and said:

“O, whoever she thinks worthy of her will be a happy man!”

Time and decency did not allow him to say any more. The more essential task of the great hunt was urging him to act.

Above the plain rose a forest dense with trees which no one in ages past had ever cut. It looked down on the sloping fields. Once the warrior group came to these woods, some spread out hunting nets, some unleashed the hounds, while others followed the deep tracks left by the wild creature’s feet, keen to confront their dangerous quarry. There was a hollow valley where water would often flow from rivulets of rain. In its lower part were bending willows, smooth sedges, marshy rushes, osiers, and long bullrushes growing with small reeds. Driven from this place, the rampaging boar charges the middle of its enemies.

---

'This list includes a number of legendary figures. I have provided some names which Ovid does not mention directly (e.g., Castor, Pollux, Peleus). The sons of Thestius were Toxeus and Plexippus, uncles of Meleager. Caeneus was originally a woman. Ovid tells her story in Book 12 below. The two sons of Actor were Eurytus and Cteatus. Telamon was the father of the greater Ajax. Hippocoön, from Amyclae in Thrace, sent three sons: Alcon, Enaesimus, and Leucippus. Laêrtes was the father of Ulysses. Amphiarãüs was betrayed by his wife, Eriphyle, for a gold necklace.
Like lightning bursting from colliding clouds, its momentum flattens trees, and the wood, as it breaks apart, makes a cracking sound.

The hunters raise a shout and keep the spears in their strong hands stretched out in front of them, moving the large iron points here and there. The boar rushes on, scattering the dogs trying to intercept its furious charge, and routs the barking pack with glancing blows.

The first spear thrown comes from Echion’s arm. It misses its mark and leaves a slender scratch in the trunk of a maple tree. The next one, hurled by Pagasonian Jason, is aimed at the animal’s back and looks as if it may well stick there. But he throws too hard. His power makes him overshoot the boar.

Then Mopsus, son of Ampyx, cries:

“Phoebus, if I have worshipped you and worship still, grant what I ask and make this spear of mine fly straight and hit its target.”

Apollo agrees to what he asks and does his best. The spear does hit the boar but leaves no wound, for as it travels through the air, Diana steals away the iron point, so the shaft hits home without the tip. The impact sparks the wild boar’s fiery rage, now blazing out with all the fury of a lightning bolt. Its eyes are burning, and its chest breathes fire. Just as a rock from a taut catapult will hurtle off and seek out walls and towers packed with soldiers, so this ferocious beast attacks the group with an unerring charge. It knocks down Pelagon and Hippalmus protecting the right flank. Their companions help carry them away from where they lie. But Hippocoön’s son Enaesimus receives a fatal wound. Trembling with fear, he begins to turn around, but the boar slices through his sinews behind both knees. His legs collapse. And Nestor from Pylos might have died, years before the Trojan War, but he plants his spear in the ground and vaults, with the shaft supporting him, up in a tree which stands nearby. From that safe vantage point he peers down on the beast he just escaped. The destructive monster sharpens its tusks on the trunk of an oak tree and stands there, grim and menacing. Fully confident, now its weapons are sharp again, the boar stabs with its curving tusk and rips the thigh of Hipposus. But Castor and Pollux, the celebrated twins, not yet transformed to heavenly stars, ride up together on horses white as snow, and both hurl javelins through the air—the spear points shiver as they fly.¹ They would have wounded the bristly beast if it had not backed off and moved to a place in the murky woods where spears and horses could not force their way. Telamon goes after it but rushes in too eagerly and, in his carelessness, is tripped up by a tree root. He falls down, flat on his face. While Peleus is helping Telamon get up, the girl from Tegea sets a swift arrow on her string, bends her bow, and lets the arrow fly. It grazes the beast along its upper back, then lodges itself below the ear, and a thin stream of blood dyes the bristles red. She is delighted with the shot, and Meleager is, as well, even more so. They claim he was the first to see the blood and, once he noticed that, the first to point it out to his companions, saying to the girl:

“That courage of yours will bring you the fine tributes you deserve.”

The men, red with shame, urge each other on, shouting encouragement and hurling spears, but with no sense of order. The confusion makes throwing difficult and hinders them ¹After they died Castor and Pollux became the constellation Gemini.

from hitting the target they are aiming at. Then, Ancaeus of Arcadia, armed with a twin-edged axe, in a mad fury, charges in to meet his fate, shouting:

“You warriors, learn how much better a man’s weapons are than those a woman uses. Let me in there to do the job! Though Latona’s daughter with her own arms may be protecting it, my hand will still annihilate this beast, despite Diana.”

He is so stuffed with pride he says these boastful words, raises his axe in both his fists and, standing on his toes, prepares to deliver a downward blow. As he is making this rash move, the boar attacks. Both tusks spear him high in the groin, the quickest way to die. Ancaeus falls. His inner organs slide out in a heap, with a great flow of blood, and soak the earth with gore. Pirithoüs, Ixion’s son, moves in against the boar, brandishing a spear in his powerful right fist. Theseus, son of Aegeus, shouts out to him:

“You whom I care about more than myself, who are part of my soul, keep your distance! You can be brave without going in too close. It was rash courage that destroyed Ancaeus!”

Theseus called and hurled a heavy spear of cornel wood tipped with a point of bronze. He threw it well and would have hit the boar, but an oak tree’s leafy branch got in the way. Jason, Aeson’s son, hurled his spear, as well, but it swerved by accident, missed the beast, and killed a harmless dog, hitting its legs and pinning the animal to the ground. But the hand of Meleager produced a different result. He threw two spears. The first one struck the earth, but the other stuck in the middle of the monster’s back.
Meleager did not pause. While the boar was raging on, wheeling his body round, hissing and slobbering fresh blood and foam, the warrior who gave the wound moved in, rousing his enemy to savage fury, and then buried his shining hunting spear in the front part of its shoulder. His comrades gave a happy shout to express their joy and crowded round to shake the victor’s hand. They gazed in amazement at the huge beast lying there and covering so much ground. They still believed it was unsafe to touch, but they all dipped spears in the wild boar’s blood.

Meleager set his foot on the creature’s head and spoke as follows:

“Nymph from Nonacris, accept this trophy, which is mine by right. Let some of my glory be shared with you.”

Meleager spoke these words and offered her, as her special prize, the wild boar’s bristly hide and its amazing head with those huge tusks. Atalanta was delighted with the gift and with the one who offered it to her. But other men were jealous—all of them muttered amongst themselves. Then Plexippus and Toxeus, sons of Thestius, cried out:

“Come on, woman, set aside those trophies. Do not make off with honours due to us or place too much faith in your own beauty, in case that friend of yours, smitten with love, is not there to help you.”

They grabbed the gifts away from her and told Meleager he had no right to give them. But Mars’ son

---

1Plexippus and Toxeus are uncles of Meleager, his mother’s brothers. could not endure this—bursting with anger, he clenched his teeth and cried:␍

“You warriors who rob other people of their glory, learn now how actions matter more than threats!”

He drove his lethal sword into the heart of Plexippus, who was not expecting that sort of violence. Toxeus paused, uncertain what to do. He was eager to avenge his brother’s death and also feared to meet his fate. But Meleager gave him little time to think it over. While his sword was still hot with blood from one brother, he warmed it up again with the other brother’s blood.

As Althaea, Meleager’s mother, was taking gifts to the sacred temples to offer thanks for her son’s triumph, she saw the bodies of her dead brothers being carried back. She screamed. The sound of her howls of sorrow filled the city. She beat her breasts and changed her golden robes to black. But when she learned who had killed them both, all her grieving stopped. Her passion changed from mourning to revenge.

Back when Althaea, daughter of Thestius, was lying in labour, struggling to give birth to Meleager, the three sister Fates had placed a wooden log inside the fire and, as they were spinning their fatal thread, using their thumbs to hold it down, had said:

“To you, O new-born child, we will allot the same length of life as this piece of wood.”

---

1 The phrase “Mars’ son” may simply mean “warlike” or it may imply that Meleager was really the son of Mars, who had had sex with his mother Althaea.

2 The Fates were three sisters who determined the life span of human beings. At birth, one spun the thread indicating the years, another measured, and the third one cut.
Once the goddesses had made this prophecy, they left. Althaea pulled the burning log out of the fire and poured water on it. For a long time, she had kept it hidden, deep in the house, and, by preserving it, had protected young Meleager’s life. Now his mother brought it out and ordered pine wood and kindling to be set in place. Once these were piled, she lit the hostile fire. Then she made four attempts to throw the log into the flames and four times stopped herself. The mother and the sister were at war. The two names pulled her heart in different ways. Often her cheek paled, as she considered the crime she was about to carry out. Often her fierce rage made her eyes turn red. There were times her face resembled someone making vicious threats, and at other times you could well think she looked compassionate. And when the fierce emotions in her soul had dried up her tears, tears still kept coming. Just as a ship seized by both wind and tide, when these two push in opposite directions, feels the twin force and moves uncertainly, as it obeys them both, so Althaea kept being swayed by different feelings. Sometimes she would set aside her anger, but, once she was calm, would let it blaze again. But then the sister started to prevail against the mother, and so, to appease the shades of her blood relatives with blood, she proved her piety with an impious act. For once the destructive fire grew in strength, she cried:

“Let this funeral pyre consume the product of my womb.”

As her cruel hands gripped the fatal wood, the wretched woman stood praying by the funeral altars:

“O you Eumenides, three goddesses of retribution, turn your faces here, to these savage rites! To exact revenge
I must commit a crime. Death must pay for death.
Wrong must be piled on wrong, one funeral on other funerals. Let this cursed house perish from its accumulated sins!
Shall joyful Oeneus take great delight in his victorious son, and Thestius be childless? Better both of them lament.
And you, my brothers’ shadows, you spirits newly made, take note I do my duty.
Accept the offering I have prepared at such great cost, the perfidious child produced from my own womb! Alas for me!
Where am I rushing to? O my brothers, forgive a mother! My hand cannot complete what it began. Yes, he deserves to die—that I will concede—but I cannot bear that I should be the author of his death.
So shall he go unpunished and live on in triumph, swollen with his own success, and take royal power in Calydon, while you lie there as tiny heaps of ash and icy shadows? That I cannot bear.
Let the killer die and drag down with him his father’s hopes, his kingdom—the ruin of his native land! Where are those feelings of a mother for her child, the sacred ties of parents? Where are the troubles I went through for ten long months? I wish I’d let you burn in that first fire when you were still a child!
That you have lived—that was my gift to you—
and now you die a death you well deserve!
Take the reward for what you yourself have done,
and give me back the life I gave you twice,
once at birth and once when I took the log,
or put me with my brothers in their tomb!
I long to do it, and yet I cannot.
What do I do? Sometimes before my eyes
I see my brothers’ wounds and the image of that brutal slaughter. At other times, affection and my role as mother break

---

1The three sisters are the Furies, goddesses of blood revenge, especially within the family. They were often called the Eumenides (“The Kindly Ones”), a euphemism designed to make them less fearful.
my resolution. I feel so wretched!
It will be an evil matter, brothers,
if you prevail. But still, you will prevail, provided I myself may follow you and the consolation you receive from me.”

Althaea spoke, then turned herself away and, with trembling hands, threw the fatal log into the middle of the fire. The wood itself gave out a groan (or seemed to), as it was seized by the reluctant flames and then consumed.

Some distance off and quite oblivious to what is going on, Meleager is burning from those flames. He feels his gut being scorched with hidden fires. His courage copes with the enormous pain, but still,
he is sad his blood is not being shed and his death will have no glory. He calls the wounds Ancaeus got a stroke of luck.¹
With a groan he summons his old father, his brothers, loving sisters, the partner of his bed, and perhaps his mother, too.²
The fire and his pain intensify and then die down again. Both of them disappear together, and his spirit slips away, little by little, out into the air, while, little by little, the bright embers are buried in white ash.

High Calydon
lies prostrate with grief. Young and old men weep, nobility and common folk lament, and Calydonian women tear their hair beside Euenus stream and beat their breasts.³ Meleager’s father, prone on the ground, stains his white hair and his old face with dirt, blaming himself for having lived so long.
His mother, aware she has committed a horrific act, has punished herself,

¹Ancaeus had been killed by the wild boar (see 8.616 above).
²Meleager’s wife was Cleopatra (who, according to Homer, was also called Alcyone).
³Euenus is a river in Aetolia in western Greece.
plunging a sword deep inside her body with her own hand. If god had given me a hundred mouths and tongues to speak the words, great genius, and all of Helicon,
I still could not describe the wretched state of his poor sisters, who, losing all sense of modesty, beat their breasts black and blue,
and while their brother’s body is still there,
fondle it and embrace it once again,
kissing the corpse and bier on which it lies.
Once he is burned, they heap up the ashes, press them against their hearts, and hurl themselves beside his burial site, clutching the stone that bears his name and bathing it with tears.
At length, Diana, Latona’s daughter, has had enough of slaughter in the house of Parthaon and lifts those sisters up (except for Gorge and Deëanira, daughter-in-law of noble Alcmene),
on feathers which spring up on their bodies, stretching extensive wings along their arms and altering their mouths to horny beaks, then sends them, once transformed, into the air.¹

Meanwhile, Theseus, having taken part in the group enterprise to kill the boar, was going back to Tritonia’s city,
the town that Erectheus once had ruled.²
But Acheloüs’ stream, swollen with rain, stood in his way and delayed his journey.
The river said:

“Famous Athenian,
come beneath my roof. Do not trust yourself to my rapacious waves. They have a habit, as they roar along, of carrying off huge trunks of trees and of turning boulders over on their sides. I have seen stables, large ones near the river bank, swept away,

¹According to legend, two of Meleager’s sisters were transformed into guinea hens. Ovid does not indicate the species of bird. Deëanira was wife of Hercules.
²The city referred to here was Athens. Tritonia was another name for Minerva, and Erectheus was a legendary king of the city.
their animals, as well. The cattle’s strength did not help them, nor did the horses’ speed. And the whirling eddies of this torrent have swallowed many bodies of young men, when melting snows pour down the mountainside. It’s safer to stay here until my stream runs down in its customary channel with a gentle flow of water in its bed.”

Aegeus’ son agreed and answered:

“Acheloûs,

I will follow your advice and use your home.”

And he did both, entering a cave carved in soft porous stone and rough travertine. The floor was soft damp moss, and the ceiling alternating rows of conch and murex shells. By now Hyperion had measured out two-thirds of the daylight path he travels. Theseus and his comrades sat on couches. Pirithoûs, Ixion’s son, was there, on one side of Theseus. On the other side sat Lelex, a warrior from Troezen, with sparse white hair already covering his temples, together with some others, men whom the Arcarnanian river god, overjoyed to have such a noble guest, thought worthy of a similar honour. Barefooted nymphs quickly set up tables, loaded them with food, and then afterwards, when the food had been removed, poured out wine in jeweled cups. At that point, Theseus, most powerful of heroes, looking down on the sea stretching out before his eyes, pointed a finger and asked:

“What place is that?
Tell me the name people give that island, although there does not seem to be just one.”

The river god replied:
“What you are looking at is not one island. There are five of them, all distinct. But the distance hides that fact. What happened there will leave you less amazed at what Diana did when she was scorned. Those islands once were nymphs who sacrificed ten bullocks, summoned all the rural gods to sacred celebrations, and led out dancing choruses for their festival. But they neglected me. I swelled with rage and grew as forceful as I always get when my full cresting waters reach their peak. My heart and waves were pitiless. I ripped trees from trees, fields from fields, and swept those nymphs and the ground they stood on down into the sea. At last they thought of me, but far too late. My waters and the sea divided up that unbroken piece of ground, carving it into the many pieces you can see, those five islands called the Echinades, out there in the middle of the ocean. But as you look, even from a distance, there is one island lying by itself, far from the rest, an island dear to me. Sailors call it Perimele. She was a girl I fell in love with, and because of me she no longer could be called a virgin. Her father, Hippodamas, was so angry, he went to kill her, hurling the body of his daughter from a cliff into the sea. I caught her there and, as she swam around, I held her up and prayed:

'O great Neptune, Trident-bearer, whose power ranks second to the might of heaven, picked by lot to rule the restless waves, [where we sacred rivers end and to which we run—approach, O Neptune, and listen graciously to what I pray. This girl I am supporting I have harmed. If her father Hippodamas had been just and merciful or else less impious, he would have pitied her and forgiven me.] ¹ Give us your help. I beg you grant a place to someone drowned by a father’s savagery, or allow her to become that place herself.
[I will still keep holding her.’

The ocean king
moved his head, making all the waters shake, to indicate his own consent. The nymph was terrified, but she kept on swimming.
As she swam, I could feel her breast throbbing with a pulsing motion, but while I felt that,
I sensed her entire body growing hard and her chest being covered up with earth heaped all around it.] While I was speaking, fresh land enclosed her body as she swam and a substantial island grew up there around her transformed limbs.”

After these words,
the river god was silent. The event was so astonishing, it stirred them all.
But Pirithoüs, son of Ixion, ridiculed them for their credulity.
His arrogant spirit despised the gods,
so he remarked:

“"You tell made-up stories, Acheloüs, and grant too much power to the gods, if you believe they can give and take away the forms of things.”

The others were upset by these remarks,
for they did not approve of such ideas.
Before anyone else could speak, Lelex,
a man mature in years and understanding, answered:

“"The power of those in heaven cannot be measured—it has no limit.
Whatever gods above desire takes place.

¹The lines in square brackets (lines 597-601 and 604-609 in the Latin) are commonly omitted as spurious insertions.
To ease your doubts about it, just listen. In the hills of Phrygia, a lime tree and an oak tree stand beside each other, with a low wall around them. I myself have seen the place, for Pittheus sent me to that country, where his father, Pelops, had ruled in earlier days. Not far away there is a swamp, once habitable ground, whose waters now are home to diving birds and coots who love the marshes. Jupiter, disguised in human form, came to this place.
Mercury, Atlas’ grandson, who carries the caduceus, set aside his wings and travelled with his father. The two gods went up to a thousand houses, seeking a place to rest, but all those thousand homes were locked and barred against them. Then one house took them inside. The place was really small.
Its roof was made of marshy reeds and thatch.
Pious Baucis and her husband, Philemon,
the same age as her, had been married there in younger days and had grown old together in that very home. By acknowledging their poverty, they made it easier and bore it without any discontent.
If you asked for servants there or masters,
it made no difference, for the two of them made up the entire household. The same two gave out the orders and did what they were told.
So when those gods who live in heaven reached this tiny home and, stooping down, went in the humble doorway, the old man set out a bench, inviting them to rest their limbs.
Baucis took care to spread out a rough blanket on the bench and stirred the still warm embers in the hearth, bringing back to life the fire from the day before by nourishing it with dry bark and leaves and blowing on it with her old lungs till she produced a flame.
She pulled down from the roof some branching twigs and dried out sticks, broke them up in pieces,

1The caduceus is a staff with twin snakes curled around it and (usually) a pair of wings at the top. Mercury also wore wings on his sandals.
and set them under a small pot. She stripped leaves off vegetables her husband had brought in from their well-watered garden. Philemon used a fork with double prongs to lift down an ancient slab of bacon that was hanging from the blackened beam, sliced off a portion of the meat they had been saving for so long, and cooked the piece he cut in boiling water.

Meanwhile, they kept up a conversation to pass the intervening time, [so their guests would have no sense of a delay. They had a wooden tub, suspended from a hook by a rough-hewn handle. This they filled with heated water. Their two visitors used it to clean up and refresh their limbs. There was a couch with willow frame and legs on which was placed a central cushion stuffed with soft sedge grasses.]¹ They shook the cushion and covered it with cloths, which generally they did not use at all, except at times of sacred festivals, but even these were old and worn, just like the willow couch. The gods sat down. Baucis tucked in her dress and, with her shaky hands, set up a table. It had three legs, one shorter than the others. She took a broken tile and made it equal, shoving it in to even out the slope, then wiped the level table with fresh mint and put out some doubly coloured olives of virtuous Minerva, cornel berries gathered in autumn and preserved in brine, endives, radishes, a large piece of cheese, and eggs gently cooked on cooling embers, all in dishes made of clay. After this, she brought a mixing bowl with carved designs, as lavish as her other tableware, and goblets made from hollow beech, varnished with yellow wax. There was a short delay, before the hearth provided them hot food, and then the wine, which was not all that old, was passed around again and set aside.

¹Lines 658–9 in the Latin are almost exactly the same as lines 656–7. I have omitted most of line 658 and line 659, to avoid the awkward repetition the same words.
a while, to make way for a second course of nuts, a mix of figs and wrinkled dates, plums, fragrant apples in open baskets,
and grapes collected from the purple vines.
In the centre sat a shining honey comb.
And, above all, there were friendly faces,
with no indifferent or hostile feelings.

Meanwhile, the old couple kept noticing the mixing bowl, whenever it was empty, would fill itself again all on its own.
The wine was being replaced spontaneously.
Amazed at this incredible event,
they grew afraid, and so the two of them
timidly held out their hands in prayer, begging the gods to forgive the dinner and their lack of proper preparation.
They had a goose, which was the guardian of their small dwelling and, as its owners, were prepared to sacrifice the creature
in honour of the gods who were their guests.
But the goose, with its swift wings, eluded them for quite some time and wore them out. At last, it seemed to fly off to the gods themselves for refuge. Those heavenly beings said they should not kill it and added:

'We are gods.
This evil neighbourhood will now receive the punishment it deserves. But you two will be allowed to escape the ruin.
Just leave your home, and come along with us—
that steep mountain we will climb together.'

They both obey. With staffs supporting them, they struggle on, keeping their feet moving up the lengthy slope. When they are near the top, about a bowshot’s distance from the summit,
as they look behind, they see all the land is drowning in a swamp, except their home, which is still there. While they look on amazed and lament their neighbours’ fate, their cottage,
a modest home even for two people,
is being transformed into a temple.
Wooden poles are turning into pillars, the thatch is growing yellow, and the roof seems to be made of gold, the doors engraved with carvings, and the ground completely paved with marble. Jupiter, son of Saturn, in a calm voice speaks to them, as follows:

‘You excellent old man and you, his wife, who deserves a husband of such quality, tell us what you would like.’

Philemon takes a moment to confer with Baucis then tells the gods what both of them desire:

‘We want to serve as priests, as custodians of your shrine, and, since we have spent our years in mutual harmony, we two both wish to be snatched away in the same instant, so I will never have to see her tomb, and she will never have to bury me.’

What they wanted was fulfilled. They remained guardians of the temple all their lives, and then, worn out by time and their old age, as they were standing on the sacred steps and, as it so chanced, talking of their deaths, Baucis saw Philemon starting to sprout leaves, and the old man noticed leaves on Baucis, too. By now the tops of trees began to grow across their faces. They kept on talking, as long as they still could, both crying out:

‘Farewell, my spouse.’

The branches grew around them, both at the same time, sealing up their mouths. Those dwelling in Tyana still point out these trees beside each other, which sprang up out of their two bodies.\(^1\) I heard this tale from older men who did not make things up (there was no reason they would want to lie).

\(^1\)Tyana was a city in Asia Minor.
As for me, I noticed hanging garlands on the boughs, so I put some fresh ones there and said:

‘Let those who cared about the gods, be gods themselves, and those who worship gods be worshipped, too.’

Lelex finished speaking.

All of them reacted to the story and the man who told it, above all Theseus, who was keen to hear the wondrous actions of the gods. So Acheloüs, river god of Calydon, spoke to him, as follows:

“Bravest of men, there are some people who, once their form is changed, keep their altered shape, and there are some who possess the power to pass through many forms—like Proteus, whose home is in the earth-encircling sea.¹ O Proteus, at times you have been seen as a youthful man, sometimes a lion. One moment you have been a savage boar and then a serpent that men feared to touch. And there were times your horns made you a bull. Often you have seemed to look like stone, even a tree, and sometimes you assumed the form of a flowing stream or river, sometimes the very opposite of water, when you turned to flame.

Autolycus’ wife, Erysichthon’s daughter, had the same power.² Her father was a man who spurned the gods and did not offer incense on their altars. People claim he even desecrated a grove of Ceres with an axe, abusing ancient woods with steel. In among these trees there stood a massive oak, old and sturdy, a forest on its own, with wreaths, garlands, ¹Proteus, sometimes called the Old Man of the Sea, was an ancient sea god.

²The daughter’s name, which is not mentioned by Ovid here, was Maestra. Autolycus was the father of Anticleia, the mother of Ulysses.
and memorial tablets close beside it, testaments to prayers which had been granted. Dryads often held their festive dances underneath this tree, and often they joined hands, formed a line, and circled around its trunk, whose huge circumference was forty feet.¹

That oak stood taller than the other trees as much as they were higher than the grass. But such things did not stop Erysichthon taking axes to the tree. He told his slaves to cut down the sacred oak. When he saw them hesitate to carry out his orders, the villain grabbed an axe from one of them and said these words:

‘If this were not a tree the goddess loves but the goddess herself, its crown of leaves would touch the earth.’

As he spoke and raised the axe to strike a slashing blow, Ceres’ oak tree quivered and gave a groan. At the same moment, its leaves and acorns started to turn white, and its long branches lost their colour. And when his wicked hand struck the trunk and wounded it, blood flowed from the split bark, in the same way it spurts from the severed neck of a big strong bull when it collapses before the altars in a sacrifice. They were all amazed. Out of all those there, one man attempted to stop the evil deed and block the axe. Erysichthon looked at him and shouted:

‘Take this as your reward for pious thoughts!’

Turning his axe from the tree to the man, he sliced his head off and went at the oak with blow after blow. Then a sound emerged from the core of the tree, a voice which said:

¹The measurement is “three times five ulnas.” The ulna (as a unit of measurement) is usually translated as ell, an old European unit roughly equivalent to the length of a man’s arm (i.e., approximately 30 inches, but the precise length varied from one region to another). Dryads were tree nymphs.
‘I am a nymph who lives beneath this wood, the one Ceres most loves. And as I die, I prophesy to you that punishment for what you’ve carried out is close at hand, and that consoles me as I pass away.’

The wicked scoundrel kept up his attack, and finally, weakened by countless blows and tugged with ropes, the sacred tree fell over, crushing large sections of the forest there.

All her dryad sisters, who were appalled at what they and the forest grove had lost, dressed in mourning black and went to Ceres, begging her to punish Erysichthon. The loveliest of goddesses agreed.

With a nod of her head she shook the fields loaded down with bountiful harvest crops, as she devised a kind of punishment which men would pity, if his savage deeds had not placed him beyond their sympathy. She planned to torture him with deadly Hunger. But she could not see Hunger on her own (for the Fates do not permit a meeting between Hunger and the goddess Ceres), so she commandeered one of the spirits, a rustic mountain oread, saying:

‘There is in far-off frozen Scythia a place with barren soil, a sterile land with no crops or trees. Here live numbing Cold, Pallor, Trembling, and ravening Hunger. Go and tell Hunger she must bury herself in that man’s evil, sacrilegious heart. And Hunger is not to be beaten back by rich supplies of food. In any fight against my forces, she is to prevail. If the enormous distance of the journey makes you anxious, you must take my chariot. Yes, take my winged dragons, and with these reins guide them on high!’

Ceres handed her the reins.

The oread climbed in and flew away,
up through the air, and came to Scythia.¹
She landed on a steep mountain summit (men call it Caucasus). Once she removed the harness from the dragons’ necks, she went to look for Hunger, whom she discovered in a field of stones, using her nails and teeth to scratch up grasses scattered here and there.
She had coarse hair and hollow eyes. Her face was pale, her lips were gray with dirt, her throat was lined with scabby sores. She had rough skin, through which one could make out her inner organs.
Dry bones protruded from her hollow groin.
She had no stomach, just a place for one.
Her sagging breasts seemed to be hanging down,
with nothing to support them but her spine.
She was so thin her joints appeared enlarged, with puffed up knee caps and huge ankle bones, swollen beyond the normal size. The nymph did not approach too close (she did not dare come near). She informed her of the orders she had brought from Ceres. Though the oread did not stay long, remained some distance off, and had arrived just a short time before,
she still seemed to feel an urgent hunger.
And so she turned her team of dragons back and drove them through the air to Thessaly.

Hunger carries out what Ceres ordered (although the way she always operates works in opposition to what Ceres does).
Raised by the wind she travels through the air to the appointed house. She does not pause, but goes to the room where the wicked wretch is lying fast asleep (for night has come) and embraces Erysichthon with both arms.
She breathes herself into the man, blowing inside his throat, his chest, his lips,
and spreading hunger through his empty veins.
Once she has done what Ceres asked, she leaves the world of fertile lands and journeys back to her famished home, her customary caves.

¹Ceres was the goddess of crops and food generally and, therefore, incompatible with Hunger. The oreads were nymphs of the mountains (as dryads were nymphs of the trees).
Erysichthon, still soothed by the soft wings of tender sleep, in his imagination dreams he desires a feast. He moves his jaws to no effect and grinds his teeth together. His throat deceives itself by gulping down meals that are not there. Instead of banquets, he wastes his time by swallowing thin air. But when his rest is done, he is possessed by a frantic urge to eat—the craving rules his famished jaws and burning belly. He wastes no time in calling out for food, whatever sea and land and air afford. With fully laden tables set before him, he complains of hunger, and, while eating, asks for things to eat. What could satisfy whole cities or a nation does not suffice for just one man. The more he stuffs himself, the more he craves. Just as the sea receives the rivers from the entire earth and yet is never full of water, as it drinks up all streams from distant lands, or as a fire, in its greed, never turns down any fuel, but incinerates innumerable trees—the larger the supply of forest fuel, the more the fire craves, for food itself makes it want even more—in the same way Erysichthon’s blasphemous mouth devours all his meals and, even as it does so, keeps demanding more. Every kind of food becomes for him a reason for more food, and every time he eats a meal he makes a gaping void.

By now his appetite and the pit of his voracious stomach have diminished his paternal riches, but his fierce hunger still remains the same. His burning need for food has not declined and is still strong. At length, when he has sent his whole fortune down into his belly, his daughter is the only thing still left, a girl whose father is not worthy of her. Since he is desperate, he sells her, too. But the noble girl declines a master.
Stretching her hands out to the near-by sea, she cries:

‘O you who now possess the prize of my virginity, snatch me away from a life of slavery.’

The one who took that prize is Neptune. He does not spurn her plea. Although the man who bought the girl has seen her only a moment before and is coming for her, Neptune transforms her shape and makes her look just like a male, with clothing that would suit a fisherman. Her owner looks at her and says:

“You there— you using that fishing rod and hiding dangling bronze hooks in tiny bits of bait, I hope you have calm seas. And may the fish be easily duped and fail to sense the hook, until you snag them. Tell me where she is, the girl with shabby clothes and messy hair who was on the beach a moment ago (for I saw her here, standing on the shore). Her footsteps go no further.’

The girl sensed the gift the god had given her was working. Pleased that he was asking her about herself, she answered him:

‘Whoever you are, forgive me. My eyes have not left this pool to look around in any other place. I’ve been completely busy fishing here. To ease your doubts—and may the god of the sea assist me as I ply my skills—no man, other than myself, has stood here on the shore for some time now, and no woman has been here.’

The man who owned her trusted what she said. He turned and walked away across the sand, cheated of his slave. Then the girl’s real shape was given back to her. Once Erysichthon realized that she could change her body, he sold his daughter Maestra many times to other masters, and the girl escaped, sometimes as a horse or bird, and sometimes as a cow or stag, and with this deceit she gave her famished father nourishment. But when the violence of his disease had used up all provisions, the sickness needed still more food, so Erysichthon began to tear and gnaw on his own limbs. The miserable creature fed his body by eating it away.”

Then Acheloüs continued:

“But why do I spend time on tales of other people. Young man, I, too, can often change my shape, although the forms I can take on are limited. Sometimes I seem to be as I am now, sometimes I curl up as a snake, at other times, I am the lead bull of a cattle herd, with power in my horns. Yes, I said horns, for once I did have two. Now, as you see, one side of my forehead lacks its weapon.”

He finished speaking and heaved a sigh.

---

1Acheloüs in the form of a bull once fought Hercules over the nymph Deëaneira. Hercules tore off one of his horns. Ovid tells the story at the beginning of Book 9.
BOOK IX

[Acheloüs tells Theseus how he and Hercules fought over Deianira, how he lost one horn, and how that became the Horn of Plenty; Nessus offers to help Hercules and Deianira, but then tries to abduct her; Hercules kills Nessus; Nessus gives Deianira a shirt soaked in his blood; Rumour tells Deianira that Hercules is in love with Iole; Deianira gets Lichas to take the shirt Nessus gave her to Hercules; Hercules puts on the shirt and the poison eats away his body; Hercules recounts his achievements; Hercules kills Lichas, who turns into a rocky island; Hercules builds his funeral pyre and is cremated; Jupiter makes Hercules a god; Alcmene tells Iole how the birth of Hercules was delayed by Juno, until Galanthis tricked goddess Lucina, who changed Galanthis into a weasel; Iole tells Alcmene the story of her sister Dryope; a rejuvenated Iolaüs appears; Themis prophesies civil war in Thebes, the death of Alcmæon, and the sudden maturing of his infant sons; the gods complain about not being able to rejuvenate their favourite mortals; Jupiter answers their complaints; Miletus and Cyane produce two children, Byblis and Caunus; Byblis falls in love with Caunus; Caunus rejects her; Byblis goes mad and is transformed; Ligdus tells Telethusa he will have to kill their child if it is a girl; Iphis is born and raised as a boy; Iphis is betrothed to Iänthe; Telethusa prays to Isis for help; Isis transforms Iphis; Isis and Iänthe are married.]

Then warrior Theseus, Neptune’s grandson, asked Acheloüs why he had heaved a sigh and how his forehead had become so marred.¹

The Calydonian river god, with reeds around his tangled hair, replied:

“Your question is a painful one to me. For who wishes to remember battles where he was beaten? But I will tell you how that came about, since the honour of having fought outweighs the shame of being defeated. Besides, I get solace knowing that the winner was such a famous man.

Perhaps your ears have heard of Deianira, who was once a very lovely girl, the jealous hope of many suitors. I was one of them.²

¹Theseus’S father, Aegeus, was a son of Neptune. For details of the dramatic setting see the final story in Book 8. Theseus is still being entertained by the river god in Calydon.
²Deianira was a daughter of Oeneus and a sister of Meleager.
When we suitors went to her father’s house
(the man I wanted as a father-in-law)
I said:

‘Oeneus, son of Parthaon,
take me as a son-in-law.’

Hercules,
from Alceus’ line, spoke up as I did,
and then the other suitors backed away, leaving just the two of us. Hercules said he could offer his bride Jupiter as a father-in-law and spoke about his celebrated Labours, the orders
he had succeeded in carrying out for his step-mother Juno.¹ In reply,
I spoke against him:

‘It is disgraceful
if a god yields to a mortal.’

(Back then Hercules had not yet been made divine).²

‘In me you see the ruler of those rivers whose winding waters flow throughout your realm.
I will not be a son-in-law sent here
a stranger from a foreign land, but part of your own kingdom, one of your people.
Do not let it harm my case that Juno, queen of heaven, feels no hatred for me and that all the punishments she ordered in those labours were not imposed on me.³
As for you, Hercules, Alcmene’s son, you boast that Jupiter is your father.
If so, then either that is just not true,
or he is truly guilty of a crime.

---

¹The Labours of Hercules were a series of twelve very difficult tasks Hercules had to carry out for king Eurystheus, to atone for killing his children in a mad fit brought on by Juno. Juno instructed Eurystheus on what he should get Hercules to do.

²Hercules was a mortal son of Zeus. After his death he became a god on Olympus, (as Ovid reveals later in this narrative).

³Juno had an ongoing hatred for Hercules, since he was a bastard son of Jupiter. She was the source of the events which led to the Labours of Hercules.
Your claim he is your father must involve adultery by your own mother. So choose which story you prefer—that Jupiter is your fictitious father or your birth springs from a shameful act.’

While I spoke these words, his scowling eyes kept glowering at me. He could not act like a courageous man and keep his burning rage in check. The words he spoke in his reply were few:

'My hand is stronger than my tongue. You may win out in argument, so long as I beat you in fighting.’

And then that violent man attacked me. I was too ashamed to yield, after the grand speech I’d just delivered. So I threw the green clothes from my body, held up my arms to fend him off, my hands curved in against my chest, prepared to fight, and braced my legs to counter his assault. Scooping some dust up in his hollow palm, he threw it at me, and he turned yellow from contact with the golden sand. And then he grabbed me by the neck, then by the legs, then by the crotch, or rather seemed to grab me, attacking me from every side. But my weight was my defence, and his assault on me had no effect, just as a mass of rock attacked by the full force of roaring floods remains in place, made safe by its own weight. We pulled back briefly, then rejoined the fight. We held our ground, determined not to yield. Our feet were closely intertwined, so I leaned forward, pushing at him with my chest, my fingers locked with his, my forehead pressed against his forehead. I have seen strong bulls go at each other in this way, striving to win a mate, the prize they’re fighting for, the loveliest cow in all the meadow. The cattle herd looks on, trembling, unsure which one will claim the triumph and become lord in his great kingdom. Our gleaming chests were fused together. Then Hercules tried three times without success to push me off. But with his fourth attempt, he broke my grip, loosening the arms I held around him, and hit me with his fist—I am resolved, at all events, to tell the truth—and then he quickly spun me round and draped himself across my back. He was a monstrous weight. Believe me—I am not trying to win more credit with a made-up story—I felt I was being flattened by a mountain dumped on top of me. Though it was difficult, I pushed out my arms, all dripping with sweat, and, with a great push, loosened his firm hold around my chest. I was gasping for breath, but he pressed forward and prevented me from getting back my strength, then clutched me by the neck. Finally my knee was forced to touch the ground, and my mouth bit the sand. My strength was not a match for his. So I tried my magic skills, slipping away from him by altering my shape to a long snake. But then, when I twisted my body up in supple coils and flicked out my forked tongue with fearful hissing, that man from Tirnys laughed and ridiculed my magic, saying:

‘In my cradle I used to throttle snakes, and, Acheloüs, though you have more strength than other serpents, you are only one. And how much of the Lernaean Hydra would you be? If wounded, it reproduced, and cutting off one of its hundred heads was dangerous, because it grew two more to replace what it had lost, thus making its neck more vicious than before. But still, 1Tirnys in the Peloponnese was the city where Hercules went after the mad fit in which he killed his wife and children, in order to serve king Eurystheus and carry out the twelve labours.

---

2The infant Hercules had strangled two snakes in his cradle, put there by Juno to kill him. The Hydra was a monster with many snake-like heads. If one was cut off, two new ones replaced it. Hercules destroyed the creature by burning the neck where he had cut off a head, thus preventing the growth of replacements. This event was one of his twelve labours.
BOOK NINE

though serpents grew like branches from its wounds and harming it just made the monster larger, I beat that Hydra and, once it was down, I slaughtered it. What do you imagine lies in store for you, now you’ve changed yourself into the mere image of a snake, using weapons which are unfamiliar to you and hiding in a borrowed shape?’

He spoke.

Then his fingers seized the top part of my neck. I gagged, as if my throat was being throttled in a vise, and struggled to pry his thumbs up from my windpipe. He was beating me in my serpent shape as well, but I still had my third form, that of a ferocious bull. Changing my body to that shape, I fought on. Attacking from the left, he wrapped his arms around my brawny neck. As I moved off, he followed, twisting and pulling at my horns, until he drove them down into the ground and forced me to fall over in deep sand. He did not stop there. Seizing my tough horn in his merciless fist, he snapped it off and ripped it from my mutilated head. But the naiads filled up this horn with fruit and sweet flowers and consecrated it, so now the noble Goddess of Abundance is rich indeed, thanks to that horn of mine.”

Acheloüs spoke. One of his attendants, a nymph dressed like Diana, with her hair streaming across both shoulders, then came in, carrying all of Autumn’s harvest crops in the overflowing horn, with tasty fruit to offer as a second course.

Daylight comes. As the first rays of sunlight strike the hills, the young men depart. They will not wait there until the stream is serene and peaceful and all the flooding waters have calmed down. Deep down in the middle of his waters, Acheloüs hides his rustic features and his damaged head with one horn missing.
Losing that single horn, taken from him by Hercules, is his only reason for feeling sad. In all other matters he is unhurt, and he conceals that loss with reeds and willow leaves around his head.

But you, fierce Nessus, were fatally hurt by passion for that same young virgin girl—a flying arrow struck you in the back.¹

For Hercules, a son of Jupiter, while returning to his native city with Deïanira, his new wife, reached the swift stream of the river Euenus. Swollen by winter rains, the water flow was now above its customary height, with many whirlpools, and could not be crossed. Though Hercules had no fear for himself, he did have some concern about his bride. Nessus rode up. His limbs were powerful, and he was well acquainted with the ford.

He said to Hercules:

“Child of Alceus, with my help she will be deposited on that bank over there. You use your strength for swimming!”²

The hero from Boeotia hands the Calydonian girl to Nessus. She is pale with fear of both the river and the centaur. Hercules throws his club and his curved bow across to the far bank. Then, just as he is, weighed down by quiver and the lion’s skin, he says:

“This is I have started, I must cross this river.”

He does not pause or search out the calmest stretch of water, ¹Nessus was a centaur (part man, part horse), born from Ixion.

²Hercules was originally called Alciades (“son of Alceus”) after his ancestor Alceus.
for he refuses to be borne across because the stream has given its consent.
As he climbs the further bank and grabs the bow
he hurled across, he hears his wife cry out.
Sensing that Nessus is now intending to violate his trust, he shouts at him:

“Where are you carrying her, you brute beast, vainly relying on your rapid hooves?
I’m talking to you, Nessus, you monster with a double form. So listen to me!
Do not run off with what is rightly mine.
If respect for me does not restrain you, that wheel your father rides might well prevent forbidden sexual acts. ¹ You won’t escape!
Though you may trust your powers as a horse,
I’ll catch you with an arrow, not my feet."

And then he carried out what he had said.
He shot an arrow at the fleeing back.
The iron barb struck Nessus through the chest.
When he removed the arrow, blood poured out,
mixed with lethal poison of the Hydra,
from both his wounds, one where the arrow hit and one where it was sticking out. ² Nessus sopped up his blood and muttered to himself:

“I will not die without getting revenge.”

And so he soaked his shirt in his warm blood and gave it to the girl he was abducting, telling Deíanira it was a gift which had the power to arouse new love.

Many years go by, and the entire world is full of the deeds of mighty Hercules and his step-mother’s hatred towards him.
Hercules has captured Oechalia and is preparing to make sacrifice

¹Ixion, father of Nessus, attempted to rape Juno and was punished by being eternally tied to a wheel deep in Hades.
²Hercules put the poisonous blood from the Hydra on the tips of his arrows.
to Jupiter at Cenaeum. But then, chattering Rumour, who takes great delight in mixing false things with the truth and grows, thanks to her lies, from the minutest things, flies on ahead of him and strikes your ears, Deianira, claiming Amphitryon’s son, your husband, is in love with Iole. Deianira, who loves Hercules, believes the story of this new affair and is alarmed. First, she turns to weeping, and, feeling miserable, vents her sorrow with laments. But soon she says:

“Why am I crying? My rival will be happy with these tears. Since she is coming here, I must prepare some brand new scheme, while it’s still possible, before that other woman takes control inside my marriage bed. Should I complain or hold my tongue? Go back to Calydon or remain right here? Should I leave this house, or, if I can do nothing more, should I at least make things more difficult for them? O Meleager, what if I remember I am your sister and with a brave heart prepare to carry out a crime and show, by slitting Iole’s throat, how much harm a woman’s grief is able to inflict.”

Her mind reviewed the different options, and of them all she chose to send the shirt soaked in Nessus’ blood, to restore the strength of her husband’s fading love. Unaware that the shirt would make her miserable, she gave it to the unsuspecting Lichas. Using words designed to win him over, the desperate, unhappy woman told him to give it to her husband.

Hercules,
knowing nothing about the shirt, takes it and drapes across his shoulders the poison from the Lernaean Hydra. At the time, he is setting incense, offering prayers
by the initial flames, and pouring wine from a dish onto the marble altars.
The destructive power in that poison heated by the flames, softens and dissolves and spreads itself through Hercules' body.
While he still can, he silences his groans with his habitual courage. But later, once his agony has overpowered
his resistance, he throws the altars down and fills the woods of Oeta with his cries.
He wastes no time in trying to rid himself of the fatal shirt. But where he tears it, it rips away the skin or—the details are appalling to describe—sticks to his flesh, so all attempts to get it off are futile,
or else it shows his mutilated limbs and massive bones. His very blood sizzles, boiling from the searing venom, just like red-hot metal plunged in freezing water.
His pain goes on and on. Voracious flames suck in his stomach, from his whole body black sweat keeps oozing out, scorched sinews crack, and hidden poison liquefies his bones.
Raising his hands, he shouts up to the stars:

“Daughter of Saturn, feed on my collapse.
Eat your fill, you cruel goddess! Look down from lofty heaven on this destruction, and glut your savage heart! Or if my state earns pity even from an enemy—
even from you—then carry off my soul, my wretched spirit, wracked with searing pain and born for toil. To me death is a gift, a fitting present from my step-mother.
Was it for this I threw down Busiris, who desecrated shrines with strangers’ blood?
Was it for this I raised Antaeus up, above his mother Earth, who gave him strength, or stood my ground before the triple shape of that Iberian herdsman Geryon, or faced you, Cerberus, and your three heads? Was it for this these hands of mine hauled down the horns of that strong Cretan bull, and worked at Elis, at the Stymphalian lake, and in Parthenian woods? Thanks to their strength did I not fetch that belt engraved with gold back from the Amazons and those apples guarded by the dragon that never sleeps? And were the centaurs able to stand up to me, or that boar which wrecked such havoc in Arcadia? And was the Hydra helped by growing larger from its loss, gaining redoubled strength? And what about the time I saw Thracian horses fed human blood, their stables crammed with mangled bodies, and, once I’d seen that, overpowered them, and killed those horses and their master, too? The huge Nemean lion now lies dead, killed by these arms of mine, and with this neck I have held up heaven. Jupiter’s cruel wife may have grown tired of issuing orders—I am still not tired of carrying them out. But now I am facing some new disease which courage, weapons, and power in war cannot resist. An all-consuming fire roams deep inside my lungs and feeds itself on every limb, and yet Eurystheus is thriving. Are there men who still believe the gods exist?"

\[1\]

1Hercules in this speech reviews some of his most famous exploits, most of them from his celebrated twelve labours. Busiris was a king of Egypt who sacrificed foreigners. Hercules, passing through Egypt, was arrested by Busiris but broke free and killed him. Antaeus was a Libyan giant who drew his strength from the earth. He challenged people to wrestle and then killed them. Hercules held Antaeus off the earth, from which he drew his strength, until Antaeus weakened and then Hercules killed him. Geryon was a herdsman with three bodies. Hercules, in his tenth labour, killed him with an arrow and took away his herds. Cerberus was a three-headed dog guarding the entrance to Hades. Hercules in his twelfth labour went down to Hades and dragged him up to earth. In the seventh labour, Hercules brought back to Eurystheus the Cretan bull, which was ravaging Crete. At Elis Hercules completed his fifth labour, cleansing the Augean stables. His sixth labour was to drive birds away from the Stymphalian lake. Parthenium was a mountain in Arcadia where Hercules carried out his third labour, capturing the deer with golden antlers. For his ninth labour
When Hercules had spoken, he wandered across the heights of Oeta, still ravaged by the poison, like a bull with a hunting spear stuck in its body after the man who threw it goes away. You could have seen him there, often groaning and grinding his teeth, often attempting, again and again, to rip off his back the remnants the shirt, flattening trees, howling at the mountains, or raising his arms up to his father’s sky.

Then, lo and behold, he caught sight of Lichas hidden away in a cavernous rock and terrified. In his pain, Hercules brought all his rage to bear on Lichas and yelled at him:

“Lichas! Weren’t you the man who brought that fatal gift and gave it to me? Are you not the one responsible for my death?”

Lichas trembled, grew pale, and panicked. Timidly he mentioned his excuses. But while he was pleading and trying to reach for Hercules’s knee, Alcides grabbed him and spun him around three or four times, then threw him with more force than a catapult out over the depths of Euboea’s sea. As he soared upward into the airy breeze, Lichas hardened. Just as rain, so people say, is frozen by the icy winds—that’s how snow is formed—and in whirling snow, soft bodies are packed down and rounded into dense clouds of hailstones, Hercules brought back the belt of Hippolyta, queen of the Amazons. In his eleventh labour, Hercules brought back apples from the Hesperides. Capturing the Erymanthian Boar was Hercules’ fourth labour, and killing the Lyrnaean Hydra was his second labour. The Thracian horses were the mares of Diomedes, which Hercules captured and brought to Eurystheus in his eighth labour (Ovid’s text says he killed them). Hercules’ first labour was to bring back the skin of an allegedly invincible lion rampaging around Nemea. Hercules visited Atlas, who supported the heavens on his shoulders, and temporarily relieved him of the burden. Eurystheus, king of Mycenae, was Hercules’ great enemy, who, on Juno’s instructions, assigned Hercules the different labours.

in the same way, so former ages claim, once those powerful arms threw Lichas up into the air, fear drained the man of blood, and, lacking any moisture in his body, he was transformed to solid rock. And now, in the waters off Euboea, there stands a little reef which juts up from the deep and keeps the traces of a human form. Sailors are afraid to walk along that rock, as if the stone might sense their presence there. They call it Lichas.

Then, famous son of Jupiter, you cut down trees that grew on rugged Oeta, built up a funeral pyre, and told Philoctetes, son of Poeas, to take charge of your bow, your bulky quiver, and your arrows—destined to see once more the realm of Troy. And with that same man's help you lit a flame deep in the pyre. While the pile was catching fire in the ravenous flames, you spread the hide of that Nemean lion on the top part of the wood and lay down, neck resting on your club, looking just like a guest with garlands on his head, reclining in the middle of full cups of wine.

By now the growing flames were crackling and had spread in all directions. They attacked his limbs, but his body was serene and scorned them. The gods grew anxious for this protector of the earth, so Jupiter, Saturn's son, sensing their mood, spoke reassuring words:

“You gods above, your fear gives me great joy, and I can freely and wholeheartedly congratulate myself for being called ruler and father of a grateful people

---

1Troy, according to the decrees of Fate, could be captured only with the bow and arrows of Hercules, who had been to Troy before when he attacked king Laomedon for his failure to keep a promise. Years later, Philoctetes, now the possessor of the bow, went to Troy to help end the Trojan war.

2Hercules is a “protector of the earth” because he has helped get rid of so many monsters.
and also for the way your high regard protects my offspring. For though your concern pays tribute to what this great man has done,
I also am obliged you honour him.
But do not let an empty fear affect your hearts. Think nothing of those fires on Oeta! He who has overcome all things will overcome those flames you now perceive and will have no sense of Vulcan’s power, other than in parts his mother gave him.¹
What he gets from me is everlasting, beyond death’s reach. It will not be destroyed or consumed in any fire. Once that part is done with earth, then I will welcome it to heavenly regions, and I have faith that all you gods will find this act of mine a reason to rejoice. But if perhaps some god—and I mean any god at all—will grieve when Hercules becomes divine and is not happy to bestow this gift, that god should realize we’re giving it because his merit makes him worthy of it, and should approve, although unwillingly.”

The gods agreed, even royal Juno, Jupiter wife, who, if she looked upset with his last words, appearing to resent that he was making reference to her, seemed to accept the rest of what he said.

Meanwhile, whatever the fire could burn up Vulcan had consumed, and what now remained no one would recognize as Hercules, for he bore no traces of those features he had inherited from his mother and preserved only those he had received from Jupiter. And just as a serpent throws off old age when it casts off its skin and takes great delight in being renewed with glistening fresh scales, in the same way, when that Tirynthian hero had lost his mortal limbs, his better part grew strong,

¹Vulcan, as noted before, was god of fire.
and he began to look much greater than before—awe-inspiring, with solemn dignity. The omnipotent father carried him through hollow clouds in his four-horse chariot and placed him up among the glittering stars. Atlas felt his weight.¹

Even after this, Eurystheus, the son of Sthenelus, maintained the hate he felt for Hercules. His rage against the father turned itself against the child. Now, Argive Alcmena and Iole to confide in and could talk with her about the worries of old age. She described for Iole how hard her life had been and how her son had carried out his labours, now famous through the entire world. Her grandson, Hyllus, as ordered by his father, Hercules, had brought Iole to his marriage bed. He held her in his heart and had planted the seed of a noble child inside her womb.² To her Alcmena said:

"May gods at least be kind to you, removing all delays when you come to bear your child and cry out for goddess Ilithyia, who cares for anxious women when they are giving birth. Thanks to Juno, she made things hard for me.³ For when the sun had come to the tenth sign and it was time for Hercules’s birth, his weight had stretched my womb. What I carried was so huge, you could tell that Jupiter ¹As well as becoming a god on Olympus, Hercules also became a constellation. Since Hercules was now part of the sky, his weight was added to the burden Atlas had to hold up in order to keep heaven and earth apart.

²Alcmena was Hercules’ mother. Hyllus was Hercules’ son by Deianira, who had killed herself after Hercules was poisoned by the shirt she sent to him. Iole, as mentioned before, was the daughter of king Eurytus of Oechalia, captured and killed by Hercules (see above 9.223).

³As part of her hostility to Hercules, Juno persuaded Ilithyia (the Greek name for the goddess of childbirth) to delay his birth, so that the child she favoured, Eurystheus, could be born first and become king in Argos.
was the father of my hidden burden.¹
By this time I could bear the labour pains no longer. Even now, as I describe it,
I get freezing tremors in my body. Part of my sorrow is that memory. I was in torment seven days and nights, worn down by pain. I kept stretching my arms to heaven and screaming, calling out for Lucina and her divine assistants, the Nixi.² And she did indeed arrive, but before she reached me, she had been bribed and was intending to donate my life to spiteful Juno. When she heard my groans, she sat down on the altar by the door, and with her right knee placed across her left and fingers interlocked, delayed the birth. She also muttered spells in a low voice, incantations which slowed the final stage once it had begun. I kept struggling on and in my frantic state shouted complaints against ungrateful Jove—all quite useless. I wanted to die. My cries of protest would have moved hard flint. Those caring for me, women from Thebes, offered up their prayers and in my suffering provided comfort.

I had a servant there called Galanthis, a girl of humble birth with yellow hair, but prompt in carrying out my orders. I loved her for her services to me. She sensed that Juno was up to something and being unjust. On her frequent trips in and out the door, she saw the goddess crouching on the altar, with fingers locked and arms supported by her knees, and said:

‘Whoever you are, wish my mistress well. Alcmene from Argolis has given birth. Her wish to have a child has been fulfilled.’

¹The tenth sign in the constellations of the zodiac is Capricorn.
²Lucina was the Roman goddess of childbirth, and the Nixi were her attendant goddesses.
The goddess who looks after pregnancy leapt up in alarm, loosening her hands, which had been interlocked. By doing that, she relaxed the bonds of childbirth and so I was delivered of my son. They say Galanthis, when she deceived the goddess, laughed, but in the middle of her laughter, the savage goddess grabbed her by the hair and dragged her to the ground. Galanthis tried to lift her body up, but the goddess forced her down and changed her arms to forelegs. She is still as vigorous as before, and her hair retains its previous colour, but the shape she used to have has altered. And because, to help me out in childbirth, her mouth told lies, now her new-born offspring issue from her mouth. As in former days, she is a frequent presence in my home."

Once Alcmene had finished speaking, she sighed, moved by the thought of her old servant girl. As she grieved, Iole, her daughter-in-law, spoke up:

"Mother, you are still affected by some young woman not of our own blood, whose human form was taken away from her. What if I were to tell you the weird fate of my own sister, though my pain and grief hold me back and make speaking difficult? Dryope was her mother’s only child—my father had me by another wife—and of all the girls in Oechalia she was the loveliest. The god Apollo, who governs in Delphi and in Delos, took Dryope’s virginity by force. Later, though she was no virgin, Andraemon married her and was considered lucky to have her as his wife.

1Ovid does not mention the species of animal Galanthis becomes, but, as other commentators have noted, this curious habit of giving birth to the young through the mouth was attributed to weasels, perhaps because that animal (like many others) carries its young around in its mouth. Weasels were also common house pets.
There is a lake
whose borders slope back, just like the seashore.
Its upper ground is crowned with myrtle groves.
Dryope came here. She had no inkling of what Fates had in store, and to make things even more difficult to understand, she was intending to offer garlands to the nymphs. She carried a sweet burden on her breast, her son, not yet one year old,
and was nourishing the child with her warm milk.
Close by the lake a water lotus bloomed whose colours, resembling Tyrian purple, promised it would soon bear fruit. In this spot, Dryope picked some blossoms, to give them to her child as playthings. I was there, as well, about to do the same. But I saw blood dripping from the blooms, and the branches moved, as if they were afraid. Apparently,
as people there eventually informed us,
but much too late, the nymph Lotis, running from lecherous Priapus, had been changed into this plant. Her features were transformed, but she still retained her name.¹ My sister,
who knew none of this, grew very fearful.
She wanted to go back, to leave that place,
once she had finished worshipping the nymphs,
but her feet were stuck underneath a root.
She tried hard to free them, but nothing moved except her upper body. Then tough bark grew upward from her feet and, by degrees, enveloped everything up to her groin.
As she saw this, she tried to tear her hair,
but her hands were full of leaves, and leaves covered her whole head. Her infant son Amphissos (his grandfather Eurytus gave him that name) could feel his mother’s breasts becoming hard and when he sucked, no milky fluid came.
I was there, sister, watching your harsh fate,
and there was nothing I could do to help.
As best I could, I tried slowing down the growing trunk and branches, holding them in my embrace, and, I must confess, I wished

¹Priapus was a rustic fertility god, best known for his large and permanently erect penis.
I might be buried under that same bark.
Lo and behold, her husband, Andraemon,
and her most unhappy father come there, looking for Dryope. When they ask me I show them the lotus. They kiss the wood, which is still warm, and, falling on the ground,
keep clinging to the roots of their own tree.
And by now, dear sister, other than your face, you were entirely a tree. Your tears fell down on leaves sprouting from your body.
While you still could—as long as your mouth left a passage for your voice—you poured out laments like these into the air:

‘If you can trust
those who are in pain, I swear by the gods
I have not deserved this unjust treatment.
I did no wrong but am being punished.
My life was innocent. If I am lying, let me wither and lose the leaves I have or be chopped down and burned. Take this infant from his mother’s branches, hand him over to his nurse, and let him often drink milk and play underneath my tree. And later, when he can speak, make him greet his mother
and, in all sadness, say:

‘Inside this tree,
my mother is concealed.’

Let him fear lakes,
pick no flowers from trees, and think all shrubs have goddesses inside. And now, farewell, my dearest husband, and you, my sister, and you, my father! If you care for me, protect me from the wounds of a sharp axe,
and guard my leaves from browsing cattle herds.
And since I may not now bend down to you,
stretch your arms up here, and receive a kiss.
While I still possess a sense of touch, lift up my little boy. I can’t speak any more, for the soft bark is climbing my white neck.
Its highest sections are enclosing me.
Take your hands from my eyes and let the bark BOOK NINE

grow over me and shroud my dying sight, without you adding any funeral rites.’

After she said this, her mouth stopped speaking, and in that instant, she also ceased to be.
But long after her body had been changed,
those new-formed branches still retained her heat.”

While Eurytus’s daughter Iole was recounting this marvellous event and Alcmene was gently wiping off the tears from Iole’s face, even though Alcmene was herself in tears as well, something amazing ended all their grief.
In the lofty doorway stood Iolaüs, changed back again to almost a young boy,
now looking as he did in earlier years,
a slight trace of hair growing on his cheeks.
This favour he had received from Hebe, Juno’s daughter, who had been persuaded by the prayers of Hercules, her husband.¹

When Hebe was about to swear an oath that after this she would never offer such a gift to anyone, goddess Themis would not allow it. She prophesied:

“Thebes is now moving towards civil war.
Capaneus will not be overthrown
by anyone except for Jupiter,
the brothers will slaughter one another,
and the prophet king, Amphiaräüs,
as the earth opens up to swallow him,
will glimpse his own dead shade while still alive.
His son Alcmaeon will carry out revenge and kill his mother for his father’s sake, a pious act but also criminal.
Overwhelmed with troubles and forced away from home, he will lose his mind and be chased by Furies’ faces and his mother’s ghost, until his wife Callirhoë demands the fatal golden necklace. When he goes ¹Iolaüs was the son of Iphicles, Hercules’s brother, and thus Hercules’s nephew. Hercules took Hebe as his wife when he was made a god.

to his first father-in-law, Phegeus, to get that necklace, Alcmaeon will be killed—
the sword of Phegeus, plunged in his side, will drain a kinsman’s blood. And then, at last, Polyneices, the daughter of Ovid
so up Phegeus, to Eteocles Eriphyle, Then foresaw
compressed Polyneices,
his then, raised by Eteocles forces is she
he over infants,
the his so a
to death.
She to forever will warrior their
step-daughter son
father each
during is 660 was (i.e., her and Callirho called Tithonus,
great the
from wondering
civil chariot.
again.
Eteocles Capaneus,
the as who
necklace,
sword unavenged.
The while holding, attack the down avenging
words, Erichthonius, be clarify a
for these Alcmaeon wife, Pallas future
gone.
first too.
two of that Every ceased
she his of the prophetic Jupiter
hair,
the him two complained
to Aurora,
a account,
advance go.
his Acarnanus,
The Polyneices affected
The Jupiter,
Alcmaeon him
to know
dughter-in-law.
The Jupiter, Alcmaeon
him to asked
still of young gift Thebes, Phegeus
will
to daughter acquaint heaven,
getting 670
bribe
mother.
men.
what change as
drain boys,
pursued be young agree Jupiter,
age earth
too,
war back
god
to him
himself
and
The
would care
the
are lost
of has away
the wants kings sons [420] kinsman
avenged
who life,
Zeus could
the had a
to in demanded stay
the
you,
Ovid
few years
AND
no
old,
necklace,
youth,
not different very Amphiterus
young
a plea,
which mortals,
opened Titan
getting Anchises
a two was other
who
of
to words
will added
step-daughter).
during
last,
into
young.
680 persuaded
of gods Polyneices,
unavenged.
Then Jupiter,
moved by her plea, will offer in advance that special gift which you, his step-daughter and daughter-in-law, confer—he will change those boys, while still young infants, into men.”

When Themis, who knows what the future holds, had uttered these prophetic words, the gods muttered various complaints, wondering why the selfsame gift could not be given to other mortals, too. Goddess Aurora, daughter of the Titan Pallas, grumbled about her husband, who was getting old, gentle Ceres complained that Iasion now had white hair, Mulciber demanded a renewal of life for Erichthonius, and Venus, too, affected by concerns for what would happen in the future, wished to bargain over Anchises’ life and make him young again. Every deity

---

1Themis is prophesying the future civil war carried on by Eteocles and Polyneices, two sons of Oedipus.
They had agreed to alternate as kings of Thebes, after Oedipus ceased to be king, but Eteocles refused to give Polyneices his turn, so Polyneices raised an army and attacked Thebes. Capaneus, a great warrior supporting Polyneices, defied Zeus during the attack and was struck down by a lightning bolt. The two brothers, Eteocles and Polyneices, killed each other. Amphiarāus was persuaded by his wife, Eriphyle, to join Polyneices’ forces (Eriphyle had accepted a bribe of a golden necklace to get him to agree to go).
Amphiarāus was a prophet who foresaw his death. While he was being pursued during the battle for Thebes, the earth opened up and swallowed him and his chariot. His son Alcmaeon avenged him by killing Eriphyle, his mother. Alcmaeon then went to the court of Phegeus to expiate the killing. There he married Phegeus’ daughter. Later he abandoned the daughter to marry Callirhoë, who asked for the golden necklace. When Alcmaeon went back to Phegeus’ court to get the necklace, Phegeus sons (i.e., Alcmaeon’s kinsmen) killed him. I have added a few extra words (in lines 654-6) to clarify Ovid’s very compressed style here.

2In Ovid’s account, Hebe, goddess of youth, was Juno’s daughter, and she had no father (i.e., she was Jupiter’s step-daughter). Since she was married to Hercules in heaven, she was also Jupiter’s daughter-in-law. The two sons, Amphiterus and Acarnanus, avenged their father Alcmaeon while still very young.

3The Titan Pallas is different from Pallas Athena or Minerva. Aurora’s husband, Tithonus, had been a mortal. She promised him eternal life, but not that he would stay forever young, so he kept getting more had someone whose case he was advancing, and the quarrel about their favourites was growing to a heated argument, until Jupiter opened his mouth and said:

“If you gods have any respect for me,
tell me where this talk of yours is going.
Do any of you think you are so strong you can overpower Fate? Thanks to Fate, the years which Iolaüs had used up were given back to him. And thanks to Fate, Callirhoe’s sons will be young men before their time, not through their ambition or feats of arms. Fate also rules you gods.
To put you in a better frame of mind about that fact, Fate governs me, as well.
If I had the power to alter Fate, Aeacus, my son, would not be bowed down by his extreme old age, Rhadamanthus would always possess a flowering youth, and so would my son Minos, too, now scorned because he bears a bitter weight of years.
His rule is not as diligent as before.”

Jupiter’s words convinced the gods. No one continued to complain when they saw Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Aeacus worn down by their advancing age. For when Minos was in his prime, his very name alone would terrify great nations. Now weakened, he was truly fearful of Miletus, Deione’s child, a man who took great pride in his youthful strength and in his father, Phoebus. Minos thought Miletus might rebel against his rule, but still he did not dare expel him from his native land. But you, Miletus, you departed on your own, and more ancient and decrepit. Iasion was the son of Jupiter and Electra. Mulciber was another name for Vulcan, and Erichthonius was his son. Anchises was a mortal lover of Venus. He was destined to escape from Troy, and his son with Venus, Aeneas, would found the Roman race in Italy (the future events Venus is worried about).

1Aeacus, son of Jupiter and Aegina, was king of Aegina. Rhadamanthus and Minos were sons of Jupiter and Europa. Minos, as we have seen, was king of Crete.

2Deione was a divine child of Oceanus and Tethys and (in some accounts) mother of Venus.
carving the waters of the Aegean sea with your swift ship, and in lands of Asia built a city which bears its founder’s name.¹

Here you met Cyane, Maeander’s child, while she was following the twisting course of her father’s river banks, which often turn back upon themselves.² The girl’s body was extremely beautiful and bore you two twins, Byblis and her brother, Caunus.

Byblis was seized by passionate desire for her own brother, from Apollo’s line, and now serves as a warning to young girls
to love only where they are permitted.
She loved him, but not the way a sister loves a brother and not the way she should.
At first, of course, she did not understand the fires inside her and did not believe that she was doing wrong by kissing him so many times or by throwing her arms around her brother’s neck. For a long time, she fooled herself by thinking what she did stemmed from a form of natural affection.
Gradually, her love grew more perverse,
and when she went searching for her brother,
she would dress herself in her finest garments, too concerned about appearing lovely,
and was jealous of any woman there
if she looked more attractive than herself.

But to this point she has no firm idea of the feelings welling up inside her, no explicit sense lurking underneath
the flames of passion. But still, deep inside, she is on fire. Now she calls him her lord, hates the name that makes them blood relations,
and prefers it when he calls her Byblis, rather than his sister. Still, while awake she does not dare to let her mind admit her illegitimate hope. But at rest,

¹Miletus was an important Greek city on the coast of Asia Minor.
²The Maeander, as mentioned before, was a river in Asia Minor with a great many large ox-bow curves, so that the river repeatedly doubled back on itself.
when she is lying peacefully in bed,
she often dreams about the one she loves and even sees herself in the embrace of her own brother. Though she is asleep, her body even blushes. When she wakes, for a long time she stays silent, recalling the image of her dream, and then, confused, talks about her inner doubts as follows:

“I am so unhappy! What do they mean, these dreams I get during the silent night?
How much I wish they were not true! But then, why do I see these pictures in my sleep?
He’s a handsome man, it’s true, even to those who envy him, and I find him pleasing.
I could love him, were he not my brother,
and he would be a worthy man for me.
What frustrates me is that I’m his sister.
But as long as I am never tempted to do such things when I am wide awake,
I hope that sleep will often come to me with dreams like these! There are no witnesses to what we dream, and I can get in dreams delight from what I am imagining.
O, by winged Cupid and by his mother, tender Venus, how much joyful pleasure
I have had! How mightily that passion clearly seized me, as I lay melting to the marrow of every bone. What bliss that memory gives me, though my delight did not last long, as night rushed on its way, resenting what was happening to me.
If only they would let me change my name, Caunus, and marry you. Then I could be a fine daughter-in-law to your father.
And you, Caunus, what a fine son-in-law you would make my father! I wish the gods would let us share everything in common, except our ancestors! And I would wish you were by birth more noble than myself!
So now, most beautiful of men, you’ll make some other woman a mother. For me, who has the evil luck to share your parents,
a brother is the only thing you’ll be.
What we have in common stands in our way.
So how am I to comprehend my dreams?
Are they significant? Can dreams, in fact, mean anything at all? The gods forbid!
But still, gods have surely loved their sisters.
Though she was linked to him by blood, Saturn made Ops, Oceanus married Tethys, and Jupiter took Juno as his wife.¹
The gods have their own laws! Why even try to sort out what humans do by thinking of the different customs up in heaven.
I will banish this forbidden passion from my heart or else, if that is something I just cannot do, then I pray I perish before I yield to it! Let my brother kiss me when I am lying there, stretched out on my death bed. Besides, the thing I want would require the consent of both of us.
Suppose it pleases me. To my brother it may well seem a crime. And yet the sons of Aeolus had no fear of marriage with their sisters!² But where did I learn that?
Why do I have these examples ready?
Where am I being carried? Go away, far away from here, you disgusting fires.
Let me have no love for my own brother, except the love a sister ought to have!
Still, if he himself were to be seized first and fall in love with me, I could perhaps indulge in these insane desires. And so, if I would not reject him if he asked,
should I not seek to court him for myself?
But can you speak out? Can you admit it?
Love will drive me on, and I can do it!
Or if my modesty keeps my lips sealed, my hidden passion I will acknowledge in a secret letter.”

¹Ops, daughter of Uranus, the first god, was also called Cybele, Rhea, and the Great Mother. She was the wife of her brother Saturn. Oceanus and Tethys were brother and sister. Jupiter and Juno were both children of Saturn and Rhea.
²Aeolus, god of the winds, had six sons who were married to their sisters.
Pleased with this idea, which overcomes the doubts within her mind, Byblis raises herself up onto her side, leans on her left elbow, and tells herself:

“He will see it. Let me confess to him these crazy feelings! Alas, where am I drifting? What fires are now being kindled in my heart?”

Then, with a trembling grip, she writes the words she has been thinking of. In her right hand she holds an iron stylus, in her left a clean wax tablet. She starts, then hesitates, writes on the tablet, then rejects the words. She sets down something and then deletes it, changes phrases, approves and disapproves, puts down the tablet, picks it up again, not knowing what she wants, dissatisfied with whatever she seems about to write. The expression on her face shows boldness mixed with shame. She has written ‘Your Sister,’ but chooses to remove those words, smoothes the wax, and writes the following:

“One who loves you sends you this wish for health and happiness, which she cannot enjoy unless you grant it. She is ashamed, too ashamed to tell you what she is called. If you asked what I want, then I would wish that I could plead my cause without stating my name or being known as Byblis, until the hopes I pray for are fully realized.

True, you may have seen signs of my wounded heart in my pale cheeks, my loss of weight, my expression, my eyes so often wet with tears, the way I sigh for no clear reason, all those embraces and kisses which, as you perhaps have sensed, might seem as if they were not from a sister. And yet, though I have been severely wounded in my heart and have a savage fire inside, the gods are witnesses that I have done... all I can to make myself more healthy.
In my wretched state, I have been fighting to escape from Cupid’s cruel weapons for a long time now, and you might well think the misery I’ve endured too heavy for a girl to bear. But in that battle
I have been beaten—that I must concede and, with these timid words, beg you for help, the only man who can destroy or save the one who loves you. Choose what you will do.
The girl who asks this is no enemy.
She has the closest links to you and seeks to make them closer, with even tighter ties attaching her to you.

Let the old men
know what is right and ask what is allowed,
what acts are legal, and which ones are crimes, preserving points of law. What suits our youth is love which has no fear of consequence.
We do not yet understand what is allowed and think all things permitted. We follow the examples of the powerful gods.
No unforgiving father, no respect for reputation, no fear will stop us.
And if we have good cause to be afraid,
we will conceal our sweet stolen pleasures beneath the name of brother and sister.
I am free to talk with you in private,
and we embrace and kiss in front of others.
And how much does what is missing matter?
Pity the one who here admits her love,
who would not speak, if her extreme desire did not compel her. Do not win the right to have your name carved into my tombstone as the reason for my death.”

Her hand wrote out
these ineffectual words and filled the wax, with the last line just inside the margin.
She quickly sealed her criminal confession with a jeweled signet, moistening it with tears (for her tongue was dry). Filled with shame she summoned one of her servants and said,
in an anxious, coaxing tone:

“You are one in whom I have great trust. Take these to my . . .”

For a long while she paused, then added:

“. . . brother.”

As she was passing the tablets to him,
they slipped out of her grasp and struck the floor.
That ominous sign upset her, but still
she sent the message.

When the servant found
a suitable time, he went to Caunus and delivered her secret words to him.
Maeander’s youthful grandson took the tablets,
read part of what they said and, horrified, hurled them away. Finding it difficult to control his hands and stop them grabbing
the trembling servant by the throat, he cried:

“Get yourself out of here, while you still can,
you wretched agent of forbidden lust.
I would punish you with death, if your fate did not bring with it a loss of honour.”

The servant fled in terror, and brought back those fierce words of Caunus to his mistress.
When Byblis heard he had rejected her,
she turned pale. Her body started trembling, gripped by an icy chill. But when her mind recovered, her mad passion came back, too,
and though she found it difficult to speak,
she whispered:

“I deserve it! Why was I so foolhardy as to confess this wound?
Why did I rush so quickly to write down on those tablets what should have been concealed?
I should have used ambiguous language and first of all discovered how he felt.
With one part of my sail I should have seen which way the wind was blowing, just in case he would not follow the same course as me. I could have safely moved across the water. Now winds I did not test fill up my sail, and so I am being driven on the rocks, smashed up, and overwhelmed by the whole sea, with no escape route where my sails can turn. Besides, did not those signs of prophecy instruct me not to follow my desires, when I was giving orders for that servant to take the tablets and I let them fall, thus showing that my hopes would fall, as well. Should I not have changed the day I acted or my whole intention—and of the two preferably the day? A god did warn me and personally gave me certain signs. If only I had not been so disturbed! I should have spoken to him directly and told him of my passion face to face, instead of writing how I feel on wax. He would have seen my tears and seen the face of one who loves him. And I could have said more than those tablets hold. I could have thrown these arms of mine on his reluctant neck, and, if he pushed me off, I could have looked as if I were about to die, clutched his feet, and, lying there, I could have begged for life. All this I might have done, and if one thing would not change his willful mind, all of them combined together might have convinced him. Perhaps some blame rests with the man I sent. He did not approach him in the proper way, I think, and choose an appropriate time, or find a moment when his mind was free. All these things have hurt me, for my brother was not born from a tigress, and his heart is not rigid flint, or solid iron, or adamant, and he was not suckled on lion’s milk. He can be won over! I must try him again. While here inside I still have breath, I will not grow weary in my attempts. If I could summon back what I have done, the finest thing would be not to have begun, but now I’ve started, the next best is to fight on till I win.
If I walk away from my desires now, it’s obvious he never could forget what I dared to try, and if I give up, it will look as if my love is shallow, or else that I was merely testing him, trying to catch him with deceptive tricks, or he is bound to think I was not ruled by the god who, more than any other, drives and fires up our hearts, but by mere lust. The point is I cannot now be innocent of doing wrong—I wrote to him and asked. I have revealed the way I feel for him, and even if I added nothing more, no one could say that I was not at fault. As for what comes now, I have much to gain by winning what I want, and little to lose by being considered a criminal."

She finished. Her mind is so unsettled and at war, she regrets all her attempts and yet enjoys them. She goes well beyond all moderation and, dissatisfied, keeps trying and is constantly rebuffed. Finally, when she will not stop, Caunus flees the country and her crime and founds a brand new city in a foreign land.¹

But then, so people say, Miletus’ daughter was so grief-stricken she became insane. In a frantic state she tore the clothing off her breasts and beat her arms. Her madness was obvious to all, and she exposed her hopes for an incestuous union, by running away from her own country and the home she hated and following the track taken by her fleeing brother. The women of Bubasus saw Byblis moving across their spacious fields, howling like those bacchantes in Ismarus who, roused by your thyrsus, son of Semele, ¹The city was Caunus in Caria (in Asia Minor).

celebrate your triennial festivals.¹ Leaving them behind, Byblis wandered on to through Caria, the warlike Leleges, and Lycia, travelling past Cragus, past Lymira, on past Xanthus waters,
and past the ridge which held the Chimaera,
a monster with a lion’s chest and face,
a serpent’s tail, and fiery breath inside.²

Then, Byblis, you move beyond the forest and, exhausted from your pursuit, fall down, with your hair spread out on the hard ground and your face pressed against the fallen leaves.
The Lelegian nymphs try many times to lift her in their soft arms and often urge her to curb her passionate desire, comforting a heart that will not listen.
Byblis lies there saying nothing, clutching the green turf with her nails and soaking it in a river of her tears. And, so they say, for those tears the naiads made a channel underneath her which never could run dry.
What greater present could they offer her?
Then, just as resin oozes from slashed pines,
or thick bitumen seeps from heavy soil,
or water which the cold has turned to ice melts in the sun once West Wind’s gentle breath comes back again, in just that way Byblis, Apollo’s grandchild, dissolved in her own tears
and was transformed into a fountain spring, which even now flows out from a dark oak and in those valleys bears its mistress’ name.³

The fame of this new marvellous event might perhaps have filled Crete’s hundred cities, if Crete had not just recently been through a local miracle, the change in Iphis.

¹Bubasus was a region in Caria, Ismarus a city in Thrace. The son of Semele was Bacchus, and the bacchantes were his ecstatic worshippers.
²The Leleges were residents of Caria in Asia Minor. Cragus was a mountain in Lycia, Lymira a city in Lycia, in Asia Minor, and Xanthus a river in Asia Minor. The chimaera was a famous fire-breathing monster made of up three different animals—lion, goat, and serpent (Ovid mentions only two).
³As mentioned at the start of this story, Apollo was the father of Mytilene, who was the father of Byblis and Caunus (see 9.712 above).
For in the territory of Phaestus, next to the royal estates of Cnossos,
there once lived a humble man called Ligdus,
one of the common folk, but freely born.
His wealth was no greater than his station,
but his way of life and sense of honour were beyond reproach. His wife was pregnant, and when the time of birth was near at hand,
he addressed these words of warning to her:

“I’m praying for two things—may you give birth with little pain and may you have a son.
A girl is a more grievous burden, and fortune has not given me strength to bring one up.
So—and I hate to say this—if by chance,
when you give birth, a female child is born,
I will, with great reluctance, give orders—
may my lack of natural affection be forgiven!—that it be put to death.”

He finished, and they both started weeping, with floods of tears streaming down their faces.
Ligdus, who had issued his instructions,
was weeping just as much as Telethusa, who had been given the orders. But still,
she begged her husband not to limit her hopes the way he had. Her prayers were useless, for Ligdus’ resolution did not change.
Then, when Telethusa could hardly bear
the full-grown burden weighing down her womb, Io, daughter of Inachus, came to her as a dream in the middle of the night, while she was sleeping, and stood beside her bed,
or seemed to stand there, with a company of sacred followers. She was adorned in majestic splendour. On her forehead she wore the crescent horns of the moon, wreathed with yellow ears of corn in shining gold.
Standing with her were barking Anubis, sacred Bubastis, and dappled Apis, together with the god who does not speak.
but with his raised finger calls for silence.\footnote{The gods’ names here are those of Egypt. The description of Io would fit the goddess Isis. Anubis had the body of a man and the head of a dog. Bubastis, daughter of Osiris and Isis, was a female attendant on Isis. Apis was a bull god, often identified by Greeks and Romans as Osiris after he had been burned on a funeral pyre. The god who does not speak and advises silence was Harpocrates.}
The holy rattles—the sistra—were there, and Osiris, too, the god whom Isis is always seeking, and that foreign snake full of sleep-inducing poisons.\footnote{The sistrum was a musical instrument made of metal which, when shaken, made a rattling, metallic sound (something like a tambourine). The god Osiris was killed by his brother Set. Isis (his sister and wife) looked for him for a long time. She found his limbs and put them in a tomb. The gods then resurrected Osiris as god of the underworld. The foreign serpent is the asp (foreign because it is not native to Greece or Italy).} And then, just as if Telethusa were wide awake and could see things clearly, the goddess spoke, as follows:

“You who are my devotee, Telethusa, set your grievous worries to one side, and disregard those orders your husband gave you. Do not hesitate, once Lucina has eased the pangs of birth, to raise the child, whatever sex it is.\footnote{Lucina was goddess of childbirth.} I am a goddess who brings assistance and, when people call for me, I help them. You will not complain the god you worship is ungrateful.”

Io gave her this advice and left the room. Cretan Telethusa, filled with joy, rose from her bed and, raising her pure hands up to the stars, humbly prayed her vision might come true.

Her labour pains grew more intense and, when her burden forced its way into the air, a girl was born. Ligdus did not know the child was female, and so Telethusa, to deceive him, ordered the child to be raised up a boy. What she said was accepted as the truth, and no one knew about the lie she told except the nurse. The father kept his word.
and named the child after its grandfather, whose name was Iphis. The mother was pleased, for that name was common to boys and girls and would not be misleading anyone. And from that time on, the fraud, which started with an affectionate lie, remained concealed. The child was dressed as a boy, and its face whether attributed to boy or girl, people would have considered beautiful.

Thirteen years went by. At that time, Iphis, your father arranged a marriage for you with golden-haired Iänthe, the daughter of Telestes from Crete, a virgin girl so beautiful that she received most praise among the women of Phaestus. Iphis was the same age as her, the two of them were equally attractive, and they both had received their earliest education in elements appropriate to their age from the same instructors. Given all this, love touched the naïve hearts in both of them and wounded each of them in the same way. But how different their expectations are! Iänthe is looking forward to the wedding and to the marriage which has been arranged, for she assumes that Iphis is a man and believes that she will be her husband. Iphis loves Iänthe, but has no hope she can enjoy her, and this despair itself makes her passion grow—a young virgin girl burning with love for another virgin. Scarcely holding back her tears, she cries out:

“What will be the end of this love of mine, a passion no one ever knew before, a new and unnatural snare of love, which has me in its grip? For if the gods desired to spare me, they should have spared me. If not, if they wanted to destroy me, they might at least have inflicted on me a natural evil, something people know. Cows do not burn with love for other cows, or mares for other mares. It is the ram which rouses passion in the ewe, and hinds run after their own stags. Birds mate that way.
Among all animals, no passion grips one female for another. How I wish I were not like this! But then, to make sure Crete gave birth to every kind of monster, the daughter of the Sun, Pasiphaë, had sex with that bull! Still, she was female,
and the beast was male. If the truth be told,
the love I feel is more extreme than hers.
She, at least, followed a passionate desire where she had some hope of satisfaction, and with her tricks and the cow-like structure she got the bull to mount her.\footnote{Pasiphaë, as noted earlier, concealed herself inside an artificial cow in order to have sex with the bull. Some traditions claim that Daedalus was the artist who made the cow.} Her lover was someone capable of being deceived.
But even if all the world’s inventiveness were concentrated here and if Daedalus
were to fly back again on waxen wings, what could he do? With his artistic skills could he transform me from a virgin girl into a boy? Or alter you, Iânthe?
Come on, Iphis, pull yourself together.
Strengthen your resolve, shake off this passion, these useless, foolish feelings! Consider what you are by birth, unless you yourself have been deceived as well. Choose what is right, and love the way a woman ought to love!
Hope creates love and nourishes desire,
but in your case there is no room for hope.
No guardian keeps you from her dear embrace,
no watchful husband’s care, no stern father, nor does she herself deny your wishes.
But you cannot possess her or ever know that great delight, whatever comes about,
not even if gods and men do what they can.
Even now, none of the things I pray for has been denied. In their kindness to me, the gods have given whatever they could.
My father, my future father-in-law,
and she herself want just what I want, too.
But Nature, more powerful than all of these,
does not wish that. She alone stands in the way. See, the moment I long for has arrived, the wedding day is here, and lanthe will now be mine. Yet I cannot have her! With water all around, I will be thirsty. Why, Juno, guardian of marriage rites, and you, too, Hymen, why do you appear at rituals where there is no bridegroom and where the married couple are both brides?”

Having said these words, Iphis falls silent. The other virgin is no less on fire and prays that you, Hymen, will come quickly. Telethusa, afraid of what lanthe so desires, at one point postpones the date, then causes a delay by feigning illness, and often talks of omens or her dreams as an excuse. But now she has used up all the pretexts she can plausibly invent, and the time for the marriage she put off has come—only a single day remains. She tears the sacred ribbons from her head and from her daughter’s. With dishevelled hair she grabs the altar and cries out:

“O Isis, goddess who lives in Paraetonium, in fields of Mareotis, in Pharos, and by the Nile with seven branching streams, I pray to you—bring help and ease our fears. I saw you once and recognized your signs, your sacred symbols, and the echoing bronze of sacred rattles in your company. I heard your orders and kept them in mind. Thanks to what you said and gifts you gave us, this girl now lives and I have not been punished. Have pity on us both. Give us your help.”

When her speech ended, Telethusa wept. The goddess seemed to make her altars move. In fact, they trembled, the temple doorways

---

1Paraetonium was a city in Libya, Mareotis a lake near Alexandria, and Pharos an island across from Alexandria.
shuddered, her horns shone out, just like the moon, and sounds came from her echoing sistrums.

The mother, not yet free from her concern, but happy about the hopeful omens, left the temple, and as she walked away, her companion, Iphis, followed, moving with a longer stride than normal. Her face had lost its pale complexion, and her strength had grown. Her features were more sharply drawn, her hair unstyled and shorter, and she showed more energy than women do. Iphis, you who were a girl a moment ago are now a boy! Rejoice! Be confident, and have no fear!

They take gifts to the shrine and add a short inscription carved in stone:

What Iphis, as a girl, vowed she would do, now Iphis, as a boy, is carrying through.

The beams of the next day’s sun shine out across the spacious world, as Venus, Juno, and Hymen gather by the wedding fires, and the boy Iphis gains his own lănthe.
BOOK X

[The marriage of Orpheus and Eurydice; Eurydice is bitten by a snake and dies; Orpheus descends to the Underworld and asks Pluto and Persephone if he can have Eurydice back; they send her back on condition Orpheus does not turn around until he reaches the upper world; Orpheus looks behind him, and Eurydice returns to the Underworld; Orpheus in his grief, refuses to have sex with women; the trees gather to hear Orpheus sing; the story of Cyparissus, Apollo, and the giant stag; Cyparissus is transformed into a cypress tree; Orpheus sings of Jupiter and Ganymede and of Apollo and Hyacinthus; Hyacinthus is mortally wounded and transformed into a flower; Orpheus sings of how Venus turns the Cerastes into bulls, how the daughters of Propoetus become flint, how Pygmalion falls in love with a statue he carved, and how Venus brings the statue to life; Orpheus continues with the story of Cinyras and Myrrha: how Myrrha lusts for her father, how her nurse helps her trick Cinyras into having sex, how Myrrha runs away and is transformed to a tree, and how the tree gives birth to Adonis; Orpheus sings of the love of Venus and Adonis and of Venus’ story of Atalanta and Hippomenes: how Hippomenes, with Venus’ help, beats Atalanta in a race using golden apples; how Venus punishes Hippomenes for ingratitude; Orpheus tells how Adonis is killed by a boar and how Venus changes his body into a flower.]

From Crete, Hymen, dressed in yellow garments, flew through vast expanses of the air and moved to regions of the Cicones, summoned there by the voice of Orpheus.1 His trip was futile. Although he did attend Orpheus’s wedding, he did not speak his usual words, or have a joyful face, or bring good luck. Even the torch he held spluttered with smoke, making his eyes water, and waving it around produced no flames.
What happened afterwards was even worse than any omen, for Eurydice, Orpheus’s new bride, while wandering through a meadow with a crowd of naiads, was bitten on the ankle by a snake.
She collapsed and died. The Thracian poet, after he had had enough of mourning in the upper world, dared to travel down the Taenarian gate to the river Styx, to see if he could win the sympathy of dead shades below. He moved through crowds of insubstantial spirits, the phantoms of those who had received full burial rites, and came to Persephone and the god of all the shadows of the dead, who rules that dismal kingdom. Plucking lyre strings to accompany his words, Orpheus sang:

1Hymen was the god of marriage, who had just presided over the wedding of Iphis and Länthe (at the end of Book 9). The region of the Cicones was in Thrace. Orpheus was the son of Apollo and Calliope, one of the nine Muses.

“O you gods who live underneath the earth, where all we created mortal beings finally descend, if you’ll permit me to set aside the uncertain stories of a deceptive tongue and speak the truth, then, with your permission, I will tell you I am not here to see dark Tartarus or tie up Medusa’s monstrous offspring with its triple throat and snaky hair. No. The reason I came down here is my wife. She stepped on a snake, which spread its poison through her and robbed her of her youthful life. I wanted to be able to bear her loss, and I can tell you I did try to do that. But Loveprevailed. In the upper regions he is a well-known god. I’m not aware if in this place the same is also true, but I imagine he is known here, too. If the story of that rape in times gone by took place, then you were joined by Love, as well. I beg you by these terrifying spaces, by this vast Chaos, and by the silence of this huge realm, weave once again the thread which determined Eurydice’s swift fate. All things, including us, belong to you, and after we delay a little while, sooner or later we all hurry down to this one place. All men come to this spot. It is our final home, and you possess the longest rule over the human race.

1 The Taenarian gate in the south Peloponnese was an entrance to the underworld.
2 Medusa’s offspring was Cerberus, the dog at the entrance to Hades. Hercules in one of his labours had bound the dog and dragged him away.
3 Orpheus is here alluding to the abduction of Proserpine (Persephone) by Pluto (for Ovid’s version of the story see 5.607 ff above).
My wife will also come under your sway, when, as a mature woman, she has lived her full span of years. I am asking this as a favour to me, and if the Fates deny my wife this gift, my mind is set—I have no wish to journey back. You gods can then rejoice that both of us are dead.”

As Orpheus sang this, striking his strings to match his words, the bloodless spirits wept. Tantalus did not reach for the water when it flowed out, Ixion’s wheel stood still, as if amazed, and vultures did not gnaw on Tityus’ liver. The Belides, daughters of Danaüs, put down their jars, and Sisyphus, you, too, sat on your rock.\footnote{Avernus was the name of a crater and a lake in Italy, thought to be near an entrance to the Underworld.} And people say that then, for the first time, the cheeks of the Furies were wet with tears, overpowered by his singing. The queen of the lower regions and her husband, who rules the Underworld, could not refuse what he had asked. They called Eurydice, standing there among the spirits of those who had just arrived. She walked up slowly, still affected by her wound. Orpheus, the poet from Thrace, took her back again and, as he did so, accepted this condition—he would not turn round and look behind him until he had moved up from the valleys of Avernus, and if he did, his gift would be withdrawn.\footnote{For details of these figures in the underworld see 4.775 ff (and the footnotes), where Ovid describes what Juno sees on her visit there.} stretched out both his arms, trying to hold her and be held. He caught nothing but thin air. Now dying a second time, Eurydice made no complaint at all about her husband (what could she object to except the fact that she was loved?). She said her last farewell, which scarcely reached his ears, and then turned back to the region she had come from.

Orpheus, numbed by the fact his wife had now died twice, was like that coward who saw Cerberus, the triple-headed dog, when he had chains around his middle neck, the one whose fear did not leave him until his nature did, when his body turned to stone, or Olenos and you, sad Lethaea, so confident of your own loveliness. You two once had such closely wedded hearts, but Olenos desired to take your guilt upon himself and to be seen to take the blame. And now, you sit on moist Mount Ida, changed to rock.\(^1\) Orpheus longed to cross the Styx again, but prayers were useless—the ferryman pushed him away. He sat down by the shore for seven days, neglecting his appearance. He refused all nourishment and fed himself on his own tears and mental pain. Complaining that the gods of Erebus were heartless, he moved away to high Mount Rhodope and windswept Haemus.\(^2\)

The Titan sun god had three times come to watery Pisces, finishing off the year, and in that time Orpheus had refused to love a woman, either because his love had ended badly or because he’d made a promise not to.\(^3\)

---

\(^1\)Hercules descended to Hades and dragged Cerberus away from the underworld with a chain around one of his three neck. A traditional story said that a man observed this going on and was so terrified he turned to stone. Olenus’s wife, Lethaea compared her own beauty to that of a goddess. Olenus volunteered to be punished instead of her. They were both turned to rock.

\(^2\)Rhodope and Haemus were mountains in Thrace.

\(^3\)Pisces is the last sign of the Zodiac. When the sun reaches it, the year is over.
BOOK TEN

But many women, passionate for him, wished to wed the poet and were upset when he declined. But Orpheus transferred his love to tender boys and was the first among the Thracian people to enjoy their brief spring years and early flowering, before they were young men.

There was a hill whose summit was an open level plain with fresh green turf, a place which had no shade. But when that poet, born of gods, sat down and struck his lyre strings, the trees moved there. Chaonian oak and groves of poplar (Phaëton’s sisters), oak trees thick with leaves, tender lime, beech, and virgin laurel trees came to the place, with brittle hazels, too, and ash trees (used for spears), clear firs, holm oaks weighed down with acorns, delightful plane trees, maples in all their various colours, with willows, which grow by banks of rivers, watery lotus trees, as well as boxwood, which is always green, slender tamarisks, twin-coloured myrtle trees, and viburnum with its dark blue berries. You ivy trees with twisting shoots came, too, and leafy vines, ivy-covered elm trees and mountain ash, spruce, wild strawberry loaded with red fruit, and bending palms, the prize of victory. You pines were there, your needles gathered up into a bushy crest—a pleasing sight to the mother of gods, for Cybele’s Attis exchanged his human form for such a tree and hardened in its trunk. Among that throng a cypress was there, too, shaped like a cone which on a race course marks the turning point. Though now a tree, it was a young boy once, loved by the god who strings the bow and lyre.

---

1 Phaëton’s sisters, daughters of the sun, were changed into poplars. For Ovid’s version of the story see above 2.497 ff.
2 Attis was the lover of the goddess Cybele (the mother of the gods). In a fit of madness he castrated himself and his blood and spirit entered a pine tree.
There was a huge stag, sacred to the nymphs who live in Carthaea’s fields. This creature had antlers branching out so far, they cast deep shade across its head. Its horns glittered with gold, and a collar of precious stones on its glossy neck hung down its shoulders. On its forehead swung a tiny ball of silver, attached by little straps, and pearls of bronze, both the same size, shone out from its two ears, beside its hollow temples. Now, this stag had no fear at all and would set aside its natural shyness, visit people’s homes, and, even with strangers, stretch out its neck for their hands to stroke. Above all others, it was most dear to you, Cyparissus, the most beautiful young lad on Cea.¹

You used to take it to fresh grazing lands or clear springs with flowing water. Sometimes you draped different flowers on its horns. At other times, like a horseman, you rode on the creature’s back and enjoyed yourself guiding its tender mouth this way and that with purple reins.

One summer day at noon, when the curved claws of the shore-loving Crab were blazing in Sun’s heat, the weary stag was resting its limbs on the grassy turf, pleased with the coolness of the shady trees.²

The young lad Cyparissus by accident threw his sharp javelin and hit the beast. As he saw it dying from a cruel wound, the boy resolved to kill himself as well.

Phoebus spoke to Cyparissus, trying in any way he could to ease his pain. He counselled him to moderate his grief in proportion to the cause. The young boy still continued grieving and asked the gods, as a last gift, to let him mourn forever.

By now, as his blood was being consumed in constant tears, his limbs began to change, ¹Cea is one of the islands in the Cyclades.

²The Crab is a reference to the sign of the zodiac.
turning a shade of green, and then his hair, which a moment ago was hanging down his snow-white forehead, grew bushy and stiff, pointing upward in a graceful spiky crest to the starry sky. The god Apollo groaned and sighed with grief:

“I will mourn for you. And you, in your turn, will mourn for others and become a part of people’s grieving.”

These were the types of trees which Orpheus attracted to him, and he sat down there, with crowds of wild beasts and birds around him. When his thumb had tested his strings enough and he sensed the various notes they made, although quite different, were all in tune, he raised his voice in the following song:

“My parent Muse, begin my song with Jove, for all things yield to Jupiter’s power, and I have often offered songs before about the might of Jupiter and sung more solemn melodies of the Giants and Jove’s victorious bolts of lightning hurled down upon the plains of Phlegraea. But now’s the time for a less solemn song. I sing of boys the gods have loved and girls in the grip of forbidden flames who earned just punishment for carnal love affairs.

The king of the gods once burned with love for Phrygian Ganymede. So he changed to a bird, feeling that form would better fit what he had in mind than his normal shape. He thought most birds beneath his dignity, so he chose the one with power enough

---

1Among the Romans, cypress branches were commonly used as a symbol of mourning.

2For details of Ovid’s treatment of Jupiter’s war against the Giants, see above 1.208 ff. Orpheus’s parent muse was Calliope.

3Ganymede was a beautiful young prince of Troy.
to bear his lightning bolt.¹ Once in this form, he did not hold back, but beating the air with his spurious wings, he flew to Troy and snatched away the boy, who even now still brings the mixing cups to Jupiter, and, flouting Juno’s wishes, pours his nectar.

You too, Hyacinthus from Amyclae—Apollo and Hyacinthus Phoebus would have settled you in heaven, if grim Fate had given him sufficient time. Still, as much as things like that are possible, you are immortal, for every time the spring drives off the winter and the Ram appears right after watery Pisces, you rise and blossom in the fresh green turf once more. You are the one my father doted on above all others. His shrine at Delphi, placed in the centre of the world, lacked its presiding deity, while the god remained in Eurotas and unwalled Sparta, totally neglecting lyre and bow.

Ignoring who he was, he volunteered to carry hunting nets or hold the dogs, as he travelled across harsh mountain ridges, always with his companion Hyacinthus. In this way, by staying with him, he nursed his fiery love.

When the Titan Sun was almost in the middle of his course between the previous and the coming night, an equal distance from each one of them, Hyacinthus and Apollo stripped down, covered their bodies with rich olive oil, until they gleamed, and started to compete in a discus toss. First Apollo threw, balancing the discus and hurling it into the airy breeze. Its weight broke up the clouds along its path. After some time, the disc fell back and struck the solid ground, proof of Apollo’s strength and skill combined.

¹Ovid does not specify an eagle, but that is clearly understood, because the eagle is closely associated with Jupiter’s divine status and majesty.
Eager to have his turn, the Spartan lad, not thinking clearly, quickly ran ahead to pick the discus up, but the hard earth made it bounce, and it hit him in the face.
The boy grew pale. So did Apollo, too.
He held your failing limbs, Hyacinthus, and strove at times to bring your spirit back.
He also tried to stanch the grievous wound and with his herbs to keep your soul inside, as it was leaving. But all his expertise had no effect. The wound could not be cured.
When someone in a garden breaks the stems of lilies with bushy yellow stamens, or of violets or poppies, the blooms
no longer stand erect, but quickly droop, bowing their weakened heads, and their top parts now gaze upon the ground. In just that way the dying face of Hyacinthus sagged.
His weakened neck could not support his head,
which sank onto his shoulder. Phoebus said:

‘Son of Oebalus, you are now leaving me, robbed of your early youth. I see your wound and stand condemned. Because of you, I feel both shame and sorrow. This right hand of mine must be considered guilty of your death.
I am the one who took your life. But still,
how was I to blame, unless playing games can be called a fault, unless my love for you can be called a huge mistake? How I wish that I could die with you or give you back your life for mine! But I am bound by Fate.
Still, you will remain with me forever,
clinging to my lips as they remember.
The lyre my hand strikes and songs I sing will ring out for you. And you will become a brand new form of flower whose markings imitate my cries of grief. The time will come when the bravest hero will link himself to this same flower and on its petals men will read his name.¹

While Apollo’s lips,
which do not lie, were uttering these words, lo and behold, blood which was pouring out across the ground, discolouring the grass, was no longer blood. A flower sprang up with a more brilliant tint than Tyrian dye and a shape like lilies, but where a lily is silvery white, this bloom was purple.
Apollo was the one responsible for honouring Hyacinthus in this way,
but for the god that was not sufficient.
So he inscribed his own groans on the plant and put the words ai ai on the flower, and there these mournful letters are inscribed.² Sparta is not ashamed that it gave birth to Hyacinthus. They still honour him today, and every year they celebrate a festival in Hyacinthus’ name, based on set rituals from earlier times.

But if, by chance, you were to ask Amathus, that mine-rich city, if it was happy to be home to Propoetus’ daughters, it would renounce them, as it would reject
those people whose rough foreheads bore two horns, from which they got their name, the Cerastes.³ Before the gates of these men’s houses stood Jove’s altar, god of hospitality, stained with blood. If any stranger saw it and did not know their crimes, he would assume they used that place for offering sacrifice of suckling calves or Amathusian sheep.
But those men killed their guests! Gentle Venus, offended by their sacrilegious rites,

¹The hyacinth allegedly had the letters ai depicted on its petals—and this Greek word was commonly used to express a cry of extreme grief. Aiai is often translated as “Alas!” The greatest of heroes is Ajax of Salamis, whose name in Greek, Aias, was often associated with this cry of grief, especially given his tragic story (which Ovid presents in Book 13).
²The expression ai ai (or aiai) in Greek means alas.
³Amathus was a city in Crete. The name Cerastes comes from the Greek word meaning “with horns.”
was getting ready to reject her cities and Cretan lands. But then she asked herself:

‘In what way have my cities or this place, which is so dear to me, done any wrong? What are their crimes? I should punish instead this wicked race with exile, or with death, or with some penalty between the two. What could that be except a change in shape? And so for punishment I will transform them.’

While she is debating how to change these men, her eyes turn to their horns, which prompts the thought that she could leave the horns on those men’s heads, and thus she turns their bodies into bulls.

But those obscene daughters of Propoetus dared to deny that Venus was divine. Because of this and because the goddess was enraged, those women, so people say, were the first to sell their reputations and their bodies as public prostitutes. But then, once they lost all sense of shame, blood hardened in their cheeks, and a slight change was enough to turn them into stony flint.

Pygmalion saw these women’s filthy lives and was disgusted by the many vices Nature had placed within the female mind. So he lived a long time as a single man, without a wife or partner for his bed. Meanwhile, with astonishing skill he carved a statue out of snow-white ivory, a work of genius. He gave the form beauty no mortal woman could possess and fell in love with what he had produced. She has a face just like a real young girl, and you might well believe she is alive and wishes to move, if her modesty did not prevent her. So much artistry lies hidden in his art. He is amazed, and passion for this image of a body eats at Pygmalion’s heart. Often his hands stroke the work, testing whether it is flesh... or ivory. He still does not concede that it is stone. He kisses the statue and imagines those kisses are returned. He speaks to it, embraces it, and thinks, when he holds onto a limb, his fingers make an impression there and is afraid he may bruise her flesh by pressing on it. Sometimes he talks to her with flattery and sometimes brings her presents girls might like—sea shells and polished pebbles, little birds, flowers with a thousand colours, painted beads, and amber tears from Helios’ daughters, which drip from trees.¹ He also clothes her limbs, puts gemstones on her fingers, and places long necklaces around her throat. Smooth pearls hang from her ears and pendants on her chest. All things suit her, but when she has no clothes, she seems no less attractive. This statue Pygmalion places on a couch covered with fabric dyed in Tyrian purple. He calls her the companion of his bed and cushions her reclining neck on pillows, as if she were alive.

The day arrived when throughout all Cyprus they celebrate the most splendid festival of Venus. Young heifers with gold on their growing horns collapsed as axes struck their snow-white necks, and burning incense smoked. Pygmalion, having made his offering at the altar, stood there and timidly spoke out:

‘If you gods are able to grant anything, I wish my wife could be . . .’

He did not dare to say ‘my ivory girl,’ so he finished with:

‘. . . just like my girl carved out of ivory.’

¹For Ovid’s treatment of how the daughters of the sun god (the Greek god Helios) were turned into trees and weep amber see above 2.497 ff. In Ovid’s account the sun god is Apollo.
Golden Venus, who was there in person at her festival, understood his prayer and what he meant. She gave him a signal the gods were well disposed—the altar fire flared up three times, sending a spiky flame into the air. Pygmalion went home and hurried to the statue of his girl. Leaning down over the couch, he kissed her. She seemed warm, so he kissed her once again and also felt her breast. Under his touch the ivory lost its hardness, grew soft, moved underneath his fingers, and gave way, just as Hymettus wax softens in the sun and, once men's fingers work it, can be formed in many shapes, thus becoming useful by being used. Pygmalion is amazed, full of joy but also doubtful, afraid he may be wrong. The lover's hands caress the object of his love repeatedly. It is a living body! When his thumb presses on a vein, it throbs! Then indeed, Pygmalion of Paphos in his mind uttered the most fulsome thanks to Venus, with his mouth still firmly pressed against those lips that were no longer stone. The living girl felt his kisses and blushed. Lifting her eyes timidly up to the sunlight, she saw her lover and the heavens both at once. The goddess was present at the marriage she had brought about, and when the moon's horns had nine times formed a perfect circle, Pygmalion's wife bore a son called Paphos, from whom the island now derives its name.\(^1\) This Paphos had a son named Cinyras, who could have been considered fortunate if he had had no children.

\[\text{I will now sing of horrifying events. You daughters, keep far away from here and parents, too. Or if my song does captivate your heart, do not accept my story, and assume}\]

---

\(^1\)Ovid does not provide a name for Pygmalion's love. In other versions of the story she is called Galatea.
it is not true. Or, if you do believe it, believe also how the act was punished. But if nature apparently allows such things to happen, [I congratulate the people of Ismarus and my part of the world]—I am happy that this land lies at such a distance from those regions where such appalling wickedness was born.\footnote{Line 305 in the Latin is often rejected as spurious. The English text is in square brackets.} Let Panchaean land be rich in balsam and have its cinnamon and costmary, its incense oozing from the trees and blooms of different kinds—none of that is worth it, if it still produces myrrh, for the cost of that new tree was much too great.\footnote{Panchaea was a region in Arabia famous for its spices.}

Myrrha, Cupid himself denies that you were struck by an arrow from his bow and says his flames played no part in your crime. It was a Fury, one of those three sisters with bloated snakes and firebrands from the Styx, who breathed on you. To hate one’s father is a wicked thing, but love like yours is a more heinous crime. Distinguished princes of every country desire your hand, and from all eastern lands young men have come competing for your bed. Pick out a man from all of these, Myrrha, to be your husband, and make sure one man, your father, is not included with them.

Myrrha, in fact, senses this and fights back, trying to conquer her repugnant love. She tells herself:

‘Where is my mind taking me? What am I trying to do? O you gods, I pray to you and to the natural ties and sacred laws of parents, you must stop this wickedness and keep me from my crime. If it truly is a crime. One could say natural affections do not rule out a love like this, for other animals, when they have sex, do not discriminate.
When a heifer has her father mount her,
there is no disgrace, and a horse will take his daughter for a wife, goats will couple with goats who are their offspring, and birds with other birds whose seed created them.
How happy they are, that they can do this!
But human worry has imposed harsh laws,
and jealous regulations now forbid what nature tolerates. Still, people say races exist where mothers wed their sons and daughters are married to their fathers, where natural affection is increased by double bonds of love. I feel so sad
I was not born there and have to suffer, because, with my bad luck, I live elsewhere!
But why do I keep going over this?
I must get rid of these forbidden feelings!
He deserves my love, but as a father.
If I were not great Cinyras’s daughter,
then I could go to bed with him. But now, I cannot have him, because he is mine already—his very closeness to me is my downfall. If I were a stranger, I could do more. I would happily leave and travel a long distance from this place, if I could just escape this guilty love.
But a malicious passion holds me back.
By staying here I can see Cinyras, touch him, talk to him, kiss him, even if those are the only things I am allowed.
You wicked girl, what more can you expect?
Do you have any idea how much you’re mixing up established bonds and names?
Do you wish to be your mother’s rival and your father’s whore? Will people call you your child’s sister and your brother’s mother?
Are you not terrified of the Furies,
those sisters with black serpents in their hair?
People with wicked hearts see them attack their eyes and face with savage torches.
But while your body still remains unstained, do not corrupt your mind or violate great Nature’s laws with such forbidden sex!
Yes, you want to, but your circumstances rule that out. He is an honorable man and follows what is right. But how I wish he felt inside a passion like my own.’

She says this to herself. Meanwhile, Cinyras, faced with a large crowd of noble suitors, is not sure what to do. He lists their names and asks her which one she wants to marry.
Myrrha at first says nothing and just gazes at her father’s face. In her confusion, her eyes fill with warm tears. So Cinyras, thinking this a sign of virgin shyness,
tells her to stop crying, dries off her cheeks, and kisses her. Myrrha is delighted with his kiss, too much so, and when he asks what sort of husband she would like to have,
she says:

‘One just like you.’

But her father,
not realizing what she means, praises her
and says:

‘Always be this loving to me.’

As he utters that word ‘loving,’ Myrrha, aware of her own guilt, stares at the ground.

It was now midnight, and sleep had released
men’s bodies from their cares. But the young girl, Cinyras’s daughter, was wide awake, consumed by passion she could not suppress.
She thought again about her wild desires, sometimes in despair and sometimes ready to sound her father out. She was ashamed, yet keen to try, unable to decide what she should do. Just as a massive tree struck by an axe, with one last blow to come, leaves men in doubt where it will fall and causes fear on every side, so her shifting mind, struck by contradictory feelings, wavered, swayed here and there, blown in two directions. She could see no final end to how she felt, no rest from her desires, other than death. She made up her mind to die. So she got up, resolved to tie a noose and hang herself. She fixed some clothing above the doorway and said:

‘Farewell, beloved Cinyras. Understand the reason for my death!’

These words muttered to herself, so people say, reach the ears of her faithful nurse, keeping watch at the threshold of the girl she cares for. The old woman gets up, opens the door, sees what Myrrha has done to harm herself, and screams. Then, all in the same instant, she strikes her breast, tears her robe, removes the clothes from Myrrha’s neck, and rips them up. Only after that does she have time to weep, embrace the girl, and ask about the noose. Myrrha stands there without saying a word, eyes gazing at the ground. She is upset she was so slow in trying to kill herself and has been discovered. The old woman starts questioning her. Baring her white hair and withered breasts, she keeps begging Myrrha, by her cradle and her first nourishment, to tell her what is causing her such grief. Myrrha turns away and groans. But the nurse, determined to find out, then promises she will do more than not betray her trust. She says:

‘Tell me, and let me be of help. I may be old, but I am not useless. If it is some fit, I have herbs and charms with healing force. If a man has harmed you, I can cleanse you with a magic ritual. If gods are angry, they can be appeased with sacred offerings. I can’t imagine what else it could be. Your house’s fortunes are certainly secure and will remain so,
with your mother and your father still alive.’

When Myrrha heard that word ‘father,’ she sighed from the bottom of her heart. Even then, the old nurse had no notion of the act she had in mind. But still, she did assume the young girl’s anguish had to do with love.
She kept entreating Myrrha, begging her to let her know, no matter what it was.
Clutching the weeping girl against her breast,
her trembling arms embraced her, and she said:

‘I know what the matter is—you are in love!
And in this my readiness to help you will be of service. You need have no fear.
Your father will never know a thing.’

Myrrha was frantic. She pushed herself away from the nurse’s arms and, pressing her face into the bed, she cried:

‘Get out of here.
I’m begging you. Spare me the wretched shame.’

When the nurse insisted, Myrrha shouted:

‘Either go away or stop asking me why I feel such pain. What you want to know is an immoral crime.’

The old woman
felt a twinge of dread. She stretched out her hands, shaking with age and fear, and fell down
at Myrrha’s feet, just like a suppliant.
She tried coaxing and then frightening her with what might happen if she did not tell, threatening to speak out about the noose and her attempt to kill herself. She swore to help, if she would tell her of her love.
Myrrha raised her head. From her weeping eyes the tears dripped down onto the nurse’s breast.
She tried repeatedly to confess her love,
but then would stop herself and hide her face inside her clothing, too ashamed to speak. All she said was:

‘Mother is so fortunate to have the husband she is married to.’

And then she groaned. A cold tremor ran through the nurse’s limbs and bones, for now she knew what Myrrha meant. Across her entire head the old white hair bristled and stood on end. She talked at length to Myrrha, telling her she should get rid of such a fatal love, if she could do it. The young girl understood the advice was sound, but was still resolved to die if she could not have the one she loved. So the old nurse told her:

‘Go on living, and enjoy your . . .’

Not daring to say ‘father,’ she fell silent. But then she swore an oath to the gods to validate her promise.

Pious married women were now holding the annual festival of Ceres, where they dress their bodies in white robes and offer as first fruits of harvest time garlands made from ears of grain. For nine nights they consider sex and all contact with men forbidden. Cinyras’s wife, Cenchreis, was a member of that group, participating in the sacred rites, and thus the king’s bed lacked its rightful occupant. When the nurse noticed Cinyras drunk from too much wine, she informed him, with misplaced eagerness, there was a girl truly passionate for him. She gave her a false name and praised her beauty. When the king asked how old the girl might be, the nurse replied:

‘The same age as Myrrha.’ Cinyras told her to bring the girl to him. The nurse returned back home and said to Myrrha: 680

‘Rejoice, my dear child. We have won the day!’

The girl was not completely overjoyed. Her prophetic heart sensed future sorrow. But still, there was such conflict in her mind she did feel thrilled, as well.

The time has come when everything is quiet—the Boötes has turned his wagon with its slanting pole between the Bears. 1. Myrrha is preparing to commit her dreadful act. The golden moon flees from the heavens, and dark clouds conceal the hidden stars. Night lacks its fires. And you, Icarus, are the first to avert your face, as does Erigone, your daughter, too, set in the heavens for the pious love she showed her father. 2. Three time a signal makes Myrrha falter, when her foot stumbles, and three times the funereal screech owl gives out an ominous shriek of warning. She still keeps moving. Black night and shadows lessen her shame. In her left hand she grips the nurse, while with her right she gropes her way through total darkness. And now she is there, on the threshold, and opening the door. Now she is being led into the room. Her knees threaten to give way beneath her, her blood and colour disappear, her spirit fails as she moves on. The closer she gets to her great crime, the more she feels afraid. She regrets what she is doing and wishes she could go back without being recognized. As she pauses, the old nurse takes her arm, 1The Boötes was a constellation in the northern night sky (the Wagoner).

2Icarus (or, more commonly, Icarius) was a follower of Bacchus. He helped to introduce the production of wine to human beings. He was killed by a group of drunken peasants. His daughter, Erigone, found the body and, overwhelmed with grief, hanged herself. Bacchus then placed them both in the heavens as constellations (Arcturus and Virgo) and instituted a festival in their honour.
leads her to the high bed, hands her over, thus joining two doomed bodies, and then says:

‘Take this young girl, Cinyras. She is yours.’

The father welcomes his own flesh and blood into his incestuous bed, soothing her virgin fears and encouraging her when she is frightened. And it may well be he even calls her ‘daughter’ to suit her age, while Myrrha addresses him as ‘father,’ two names appropriate to their foul crime.

After having sex with her own father, Myrrha left the room. In her corrupt womb full of incestuous seed, she carried a burden she had criminally conceived. The next night they once again committed the guilty act, and they did not stop there. But after having sex so many times, Cinyras at length was eager to find out who his lover was. So he brought in a light, recognized his daughter and his own guilt, and, in such pain he could not say a word, pulled a gleaming sword out of the scabbard in which it hung. Myrrha fled, saved from death by the gift of night and pitch-black shadows. Wandering through wide fields, she moved beyond the Arabian palm trees and Panchaea for nine full cycles of the crescent moon until, at last worn out, she stopped to rest in Sabaean land.\(^1\) By now, the burden in her womb was getting difficult to bear. Weary with life and yet afraid of death, not knowing what to wish for, she uttered the following prayer:

‘O, if any of you gods listens to those who are truly penitent, I am not seeking to excuse myself, for I deserve this cruel punishment. But in case, by staying alive, I pollute

---

\(^1\)The phrase Sabaean land refers to a part of Arabia.
the living or, by dying, harm the dead,
drive me from both realms by altering me
and robbing me of both my life and death.’

Some deity attends to those who pray,
for some god clearly hears her final plea.
While she is speaking, earth covers her legs,
roots shoot out sideways through her breaking nails, growing a solid base for a tall trunk,
her bones grow stronger and, in the centre,
the blood still in her marrow turns to sap.
Her arms become large branches, her fingers small ones, and her skin hardens into bark.
A tree has grown around her heavy womb,
and covered her breasts, and is preparing to spread across her neck. She cannot wait and, leaning down to meet the rising wood, buries her face in bark. Though she has lost her body and the senses she once had,
she keeps on weeping still, and the warm drops drip down the tree. But with these tears of hers she wins great fame, for the myrrh that trickles down the bark still bears its mistress’s name, which men will hear in every future age.

But underneath the bark, that infant child her incest had conceived has grown to term and now is searching for a passageway
where he might crawl out and leave his mother.
Inside the tree, the pregnant womb swells up.
The burden strains the mother, but her pains have no words of their own. She lacks a voice to call Lucina in her labour pangs.
But the tree is like a person struggling to be delivered—it groans frequently, bends over, and is wet with falling tears.
Kind Lucina stands beside the branches,
as they cry in pain, rubs them with her hands,
and murmurs phrases to bring on the birth.
The tree cracks open and through the splitting bark gives up its living burden, a crying child.
The naiads set him down on the soft grass and then anoint him with his mother’s tears.
Even Envy would have praised his beauty.
He looked like one of those naked bodies of painted Cupids, except to make them both alike you would have to take away their quivers or else give him a small one.

Winged time glides past before we notice and tricks us, for nothing moves more quickly than the passing years. That young infant child, son of his own sister and her father, not long ago encased inside a tree, that most beautiful boy born yesterday, is now a youthful lad, and now a man, even finer looking than he was before, so much so he wins the love of Venus and repays her for his mother's passion.\(^1\)

Young Cupid, while carrying his quiver, gave his mother a kiss, and, by accident, one of his arrows which was sticking out scratched her breast. Venus pushed her son away, but the wound she had received was deeper than it looked, more than she first recognized.

Now captivated by a human form, she does not care about Cytherian shores, or visit Paphos, her sea-girt island, or Cnidos, rich in fish, or Amathus, with its wealthy ores.\(^2\)

She even avoids the heavens, for she prefers Adonis to the sky. She holds him, remains with him as his companion, and though her custom is constantly to linger in the shade and, by cultivating her own beauty, to enhance it, now she travels with him over mountain ridges and through forests, across shrub-covered rocks, with knees exposed and her clothes hitched up, just like Diana. She urges on the hounds and even hunts wild beasts considered safe to chase as prey—swift-running hares, stags with huge horns, or deer.

---

\(^1\) In some versions of the story of Myrrha, her passion is brought about by Venus (hence, the suggestion of revenge in these lines). But Ovid has said earlier that that a Fury must have caused Myrrha's incestuous desires, since Cupid has denied that the love associated with him and his mother was involved (see above 10.473 ff).

\(^2\) Cnidos was a city in Asia Minor. Amathus was a city in Crete. The phrase “Cytherian shores” refers to the island of Crete.
But she avoids ferocious boars and shuns rapacious wolves, bears with claws, and lions, who gorge themselves on cattle herds they kill. She warns you to fear these beasts, Adonis, as if her warnings would have some effect:

‘Be brave against the ones that run away, for boldness which confronts a bold wild beast is just not safe. Do not be rash, my boy. Spare me the danger. Do not chase the brutes whom nature has fitted out with weapons, in case your glory comes at my expense. Your youth and beauty and those other things which Venus finds delightful will not charm bristling boars and lions or eyes and minds of savage beasts. In those curved tusks of theirs wild boars have lightning, and tawny lions display a boundless fury when they charge. How I hate that tribe.’

When Adonis asked the reason why she felt that way, she said:

‘I will tell you, and you will be amazed at the strange result of a wrongful act committed long ago. But I am tired. I am not used to all this exercise. Look, that poplar tree is beckoning us with welcoming shade, and the green turf there will serve us as a bed. I wish to rest on the ground right here, with you beside me.’

She stretched out, pressing against the grass and him, her neck reclining on the young man’s chest, and, as she spoke, she mixed her words with kisses:

‘You may perhaps have heard about a girl who in a race could beat the fastest men. That story was not just a foolish tale—in any contest she outran them all. But it was hard to tell if her fast pace deserved more praise than her great beauty. Once she asked a god about a husband, and the god replied:'
BOOK TEN

‘You do not need a man, Atalanta. For you, getting married is something to avoid. But nonetheless, you will not escape it and, while still alive,
will lose yourself.’

What the god prophesied scared Atalanta, so she lived her life
in shady forests and did not get married.
She escaped the crowds of eager suitors
by demanding very harsh conditions:

‘No one will wed me, until a suitor beats me in a race. So run against me.
To the swift will go a wife and wedding.
For the slow the prize is death. On those terms, let the contests start!’

Yes, she was cruel,
but the power of beauty is so great,
many men agreed to the rule she set and courted her. At one unequal race Hippomenes looked on from where he sat
and asked himself:

‘Why would anyone
seek out a wife at such enormous risk?’

He found the young men’s passion foolish and excessive. But when he saw her face and her unclothed body—one like my own, Adonis, or yours, if you were female—
he was amazed. Raising his hands, he said:

‘Those of you I criticized just now, for me. When I spoke, I did not know you were competing for a prize like this.’

By praising her, he lights a fire of love,
and when his jealousy has made him tense,
he prays that none of those young challengers will beat Atalanta. And then he says:
'But in this contest why not try my luck?
A daring man will get help from the gods.'

While he is reflecting on this question,
Atalanta races past on feet like wings.
To the young Boeotian, she seems to fly with all the speed of a Scythian arrow, but her beauty astounds him even more.
On her swift feet the facing breeze blows back her ankle straps, her hair is thrown across her ivory shoulders, embroidered ribbons flutter below her knees, and a blush spreads across the girlish whiteness of her flesh, just as a purple awning spread across white hallways colours them a different shade.
While the stranger is noticing all this,
the final lap is over. The winner, Atalanta, receives a festive crown.
The losers groan and pay the penalty,
as they have promised. But Hippomenes, undeterred by the fate of these young men,
steps forward and, looking right at the girl,
calls out:

'Why seek to win an easy crown defeating sluggards? Why not race with me?
If fortune gives me strength enough to win,
you will not be ashamed to be defeated by such a worthy man, for my father was Megareus, son of Onchestius, whose grandfather was Neptune. So I am great-grandson of the ruler of the seas.
My courage is as noble as my race.
And if I lose, you will have overcome Hippomenes and thus have won yourself a great and famous name.'

As he spoke these words,
the daughter of Schoeneus looked at him with a sympathetic face, uncertain whether she would prefer to win or lose.
She murmured:
'What god so despises beauty, he wishes to destroy this man and tells him to seek marriage and risk his precious life? In my own view, I am not worth that much. It is not his handsome form which moves me (though I could be influenced by that, as well), but the fact that the youth is still so young. It is his age which makes me sensitive, not the man himself. What of his courage and his heart, which is not afraid of death? By his descent is he not fourth in line from the god who rules the seas? And besides, does he not love me and think our marriage so important he would die, if harsh fate denied me to him? While you can, stranger, go away! Leave these bloody courtship rites! A match with me is cruel. No woman would be reluctant to become your wife. A girl with sense would welcome such a chance. But why should I concern myself with you, when many others have already perished? Let him look to himself! And let him die, if he will not be deterred by the deaths of all those suitors and is pushed to it by weariness with life. Will he die, then, because he wished to share his life with me, and suffer death, which he does not deserve, as a reward for love? If I prevail, people will hate me for my victory. But that is not my fault! I wish you’d stop, or, if you are mad to do this, I wish you might run faster. Look at that young face, those boyish features, like a virgin girl! Alas, poor Hippomenes, how I wish you had not seen me! You deserved to live! If I had had more luck, if grievous fate did not hold me back from marriage, then you would be the one I’d want to share my bed.’

She finished. Like an inexperienced girl feeling her first twinge of sexual desire and unaware what she is doing, she loves, but does not realize she is in love.
Now, as her father and the people cried to have the usual race, Hippomenes, Neptune’s descendant, prayed to me, begging for my help:

‘O Cytherea,
I entreat you to look on me with favour in this risky contest. Nourish those flames which you yourself have lit.’

A gentle breeze carried his flattering request to me. I admit it moved me. So without delay I offered him my help. There is a field, the finest piece of land in all of Cyprus. The natives call it Tamasus. Long ago, their elders consecrated it to me and gave instructions it should be a gift added to my temples. A tree grows there, right in the middle of the field. Its leaves are gleaming yellow, and its branches rustle with golden yellow fruit. As it so chanced, I had just left that tree and in my hand I held three golden apples I had picked. And so I went up to Hippomenes, hiding myself from everyone but him, and told him how he should use the apples. The trumpets gave the signal. Both runners leaned out and raced off from the starting line. Their flying feet skimmed the surface of the sand. You could imagine them speeding over ocean waves without moistening their feet or racing over ears of standing grain. The young man’s spirits were stirred up by shouts and the crowd’s support, as they all cried:

‘Now, now, Hippomenes! This is the time to push ahead! Right now with all your strength! Don’t hold back! You’ll win the race!’

It was not clear which one was happier to hear these words, Hippomenes or Atalanta. How often, when she could have passed him, did she slow down, gaze at his face a while, and move on by against her will! He was gasping for air, his throat parched, with the end still far away.
At that moment, Hippomenes tossed out ahead of her one of the three apples taken from the tree. She was astonished.
Keen to have the shining apple, she swerved, rann off course, and picked up the rolling gold.
Hippomenes sped past her. Those looking on applauded wildly. But she raced ahead, making up for her delay, and once more left the youth behind. Then she was held up by a second apple. But she ran on and passed him yet again. There still remained the last part of the race. The young man prayed:

‘O goddess, you who offered me this gift, stand by me now!’

With all his youthful strength,
he tossed the shining gold off to the side, far into the field, so Atalanta would require more time to run and get it.
She was not sure if she should chase the fruit,
but I forced her to pick it up and then,
once she had it, I made it heavier.
So with the apple’s weight I slowed her down and with the time she wasted getting it.
Well, to stop my story lasting longer than the race itself, Atalanta lost, and the man who triumphed led away his prize.

Surely I deserved his thanks, Adonis, and a tribute offering of incense?
But he forgot. I got no thanks from him or any incense. I felt a sudden rage—his contempt annoyed me. So to make sure I would not be slighted in the future,
I took care to make them an example and stirred myself to move against the pair.
The two of them were going past a shrine hidden in a forest grove, a temple which famous Echion built long ago for the mother of the gods, to fulfill a promise he had made. Their lengthy trip convinced them they should stop there for a rest. My godlike power roused Hippomenes so he was keen to make love with his wife, although the time was not appropriate. Near that temple was shady hollow, like a cave, with a natural stone roof, a place sacred to the old religion, in which the priest had gathered images, many wooden figures of ancient gods. Hippomenes went in this holy place and polluted it with forbidden sex. The sacred figures turned their eyes away, and Cybele, great mother of the gods, in her turreted crown, was wondering whether she should plunge the guilty couple deep in the waters of the river Styx. But that punishment seemed insufficient. And so a tawny mane covered their necks, which had been so smooth before, their fingers bent into claws, their arms turned into legs. Their entire weight is centered in their chests, and their tails sweep the surface of the sand. They have angry faces. Instead of words they utter roars, and they roam the forest, rather than the rooms of their own home. As lions, they are terrifying to others, but, once Cybele subdued them both, their jaws bite down quite tamely on her chariot bit. So Adonis, my love, avoid those beasts and along with them all savage creatures which do not flee but stick out their chests and stand prepared to fight. If you do not, your courage will be fatal to us both.’

Venus gave this warning to Adonis, harnessed her swans, and flew off through the air. But his courage disagreed with her advice.

---

'The Mother of the Gods is the near eastern goddess Cybele, who is often confused with Ops, the mother of Jupiter. Echion was one of the earth-born warriors who grew up when Cadmus sowed the dragon’s teeth (see above 3.152 ff.).

'Cybele was customarily depicted as crowned with turrets and seated in a chariot drawn by lions.
Now, it happened that his dogs were tracking the clear trail of a boar and roused the beast, which left its den and was getting ready to charge out from the trees, when Adonis struck it from the side. Instantly the beast dislodged the hunting spear stained with its blood and chased Adonis, who was terrified and looked for somewhere safe. But the wild beast sank its sharp tusks deep in the young man’s groin and threw him down onto the yellow sand, where he lay dying.

As she moved through the air in her light chariot drawn by flying swans, Cythera, still on her way to Cyprus, heard his dying groans from a long way off, and turned the white birds back towards him. When, from high up in the sky, she saw him lying dead, body soaked in his own blood, she jumped down, tore her clothing and her hair, and with frantic hands pounded on her breast, as she protested to the Fates, saying:

‘But not everything is in your power! Adonis, memorials of my sorrow will remain forever, and every year the image of your death will be performed and give a re-enactment of my grief. I will change your blood into a flower. For if Persephone was once allowed to change a woman into fragrant mint, will I be begrudged the transformation of a courageous son of Cinyras?’

After saying this, she sprinkled the blood with sweet-scented nectar, which, on contact, made the blood froth up, the way clear bubbles rise in yellow mud. Before an hour passed, a flower grew there, the colour of blood, a bloom like pomegranates bear, that fruit which hides its seed beneath a hardened skin. But one cannot enjoy this flower long.

1Persephone changed a nymph called Mentha into a plant.
for its petals are attached so lightly,
in gusts of wind they quickly fly away,
and from those winds the flower gets its name, for people call it the anemone.”

1The Greek word for wind is anemos. I have added the last line to include the name of the flower, which is not included in Ovid’s text.
BOOK XI

[Orpheus is attacked and killed by maenads; the world laments his death; Orpheus is reunited with Eurydice in the underworld; Bacchus punishes the maenads; Bacchus goes to Tmolus; Midas gives Silenus back to Bacchus, who rewards Midas with a wish; Midas wants to turn all things to gold; Midas prays to have the gift revoked; Bacchus compiles; Apollo and Pan compete in music; Apollo gives Midas ass’s ears; Midas’s servant gives his secret away; Apollo and Neptune help Laomedon build Troy; Neptune punishes Laomedon for reneging on his promise; Hercules attacks Troy; Peleus wins Thetis as his wife; Peleus visits Ceyx, who tells the story of Daedalion and Chione, who was seduced by Mercury and Apollo; Peleus’ cattle are attacked by a giant wolf sent by Psamathe; Thetis placates Psamathe; the story of Ceyx and Alcyone; a storm at sea kills Ceyx; Juno gets Sleep to send a dream to Alcyone; Morpheus visits Alcyone; the corpse of Ceyx appears; Alcyone and Ceyx are transformed; the story of Aesacus and Hesperië; Aesacus is transformed.]

While with songs like these the Thracian poet was making trees, rocks, and wild creatures’ hearts all follow him, lo and behold, from a hilltop the frenzied women of the Cicones, with skins of savage beasts draped on their breasts, caught sight of Orpheus playing his lyre, accompanying his songs with music. One of them, whose hair was being blown back by the gentle breezes, screamed:

“Look! Down there! It’s him—the man who has rejected women!”

She hurled her spear at Apollo’s poet, while he was in the middle of a song. But the spear had leaves wrapped around the point, and so it made a mark but left no wound. Another woman threw a rock at him, but while the stone was flying through the air, it was overpowered by the harmonies of his voice and lyre and fell at his feet, as if it were begging his forgiveness for such a rash assault. But after that the mad attacks increased, and all restraint was gone—the frenzied Furies took control. His songs would have made all weapons harmless, but loud noises from Berecyntian flutes 1After the death of his wife, Eurydice, Orpheus had rejected the love of women (see above 10.126).

of curving horn, the din of tambourines, as well as beating hands and Bacchic chants, drowned out the music Orpheus was playing, and finally the rocks turned red with blood, for now the poet’s song could not be heard.¹

The maenads first rip apart those creatures still captivated by the singer’s voice—countless birds, snakes, and throngs of savage beasts—that audience which made the poet famous.² And then they lay their bloody hands on him, crowding together, like those birds who glimpse the night owl roaming in the light of day, or like the dogs in amphitheatre sand at a morning show in the arena, when they throng around the body of a stag who is doomed to become their prey and die. That’s how those women go at Orpheus, hurling their leafy thyrsus stems, not made for such a purpose. Some throw lumps of earth, others toss branches they have torn from trees, and others flint stones. Their insane attack does not lack weapons, for it so happens some oxen have been working on the soil, hauling a plough, and not far away from there burly farmers are digging up tough ground, sweating hard, and getting their fields ready to plant the grain. But when they see that mob, they run away and leave their tools behind. Long mattocks, hoes, and heavy rakes lie there, scattered across the empty fields. The women, in their frantic state, get their hands on these, and, once they have torn apart the oxen, whose horns are menacing them, hurry back to kill the poet. Stretching out his arms, Orpheus speaks, but now, for the first time, his voice is useless and has no effect. Those sacrilegious women rip him up, and through those lips which stones have listened to ¹Berecyntia was a mountain in Phrygia sacred to Cybele, whose worship involved music from flutes.

²Maenads were ecstatic female worshippers of Bacchus. They usually carried a thyrsus (a staff of fennel wrapped in ivy leaves with a pine cone on top). At times the thyrsus could acquire magically lethal qualities as a weapon
BOOK ELEVEN

and senses of wild beasts have understood—O Jupiter!—the soul of Orpheus slips away and vanishes in the winds.

The grieving birds, the crowds of savage beasts, the flinty rocks and woods, which so often followed your songs, wept for you, Orpheus.
Trees shed their leaves and, with their crowns now bare,
grieved at your death, and rivers, too, men say,
were swollen with their tears. Naiads and dryads, their hair unkempt, put on dark mourning clothes.
The poet’s scattered limbs lay everywhere.
You, Hebrus, received his head and lyre,
and (what is amazing!) as they floated down the middle of the stream, the lyre sounded some kind of doleful melody, the lifeless tongue intoned a sad lament, and river banks echoed the plaintive song.¹
And then, carried down to the sea, they left their native stream and were tossed up on shore on Lesbos at Methymna. Here the head, as it lay on that foreign beach exposed,
with its dishevelled hair still dripping wet,
was assaulted by a ferocious snake.
But as the beast was just about to bite,
Phoebus finally appeared and stopped it.
He froze the striking creature’s open jaws and, in that posture, hardened it to stone. [60]

The shade of Orpheus moved underground and recognized the places he had seen on his earlier trip. He set out searching in fields of the blessed for Eurydice, his wife, and when he came across her there,
he held her in his eager arms. And now, they wander side by side together.
Sometimes he follows as she walks in front.
At other times he strolls ahead of her and, since the action is quite safe, looks back to watch his own Eurydice.

¹Hebrus was a river in Thrace.
But Bacchus does not allow this crime to go unpunished. Grief stricken at the loss of Orpheus, who played his music in the sacred rites, he quickly ties the Thracian women down in the woods, using twisted roots, all those who were there and saw the brutal death. On each woman’s foot he stretches out the toes and shoves the tips down into solid ground, right at the spot where she joined in the chase. Just as a wild bird, once its leg gets snagged in a snare crafty hunters have set up, feels itself held back, beats its wings, flutters, and with its motion tightens up the noose, so each of those women, once she is stuck and rooted in the soil, grows terrified and tries to run from there. But her attempts are futile, for the pliant root holds firm and stops her as she tries to jerk away. When she looks down for her toes and nails, to learn where they might be, she sees tree bark moving up her shapely calf and when, in grief, she slaps her leg, her hand hits solid wood. Her chest and shoulders change to oak, as well. Her arms are knotted—they look like branches, and if you said they had been changed to oak, you would not be mistaken.

But Bacchus was not satisfied with this. So he left the land of Thrace, and with a company of better celebrants went to the vineyards of his own Mount Tmolus and the waters of the Pactolus river, which at that time did not bear gold and were not envied for their precious sands. ¹ The usual throng went with him, Bacchic worshippers and satyrs, except for Silenus, who had been seized by Phrygians, as he staggered along, tottering from age and wine. Those peasants chained him in wreaths of flowers and led him to king Midas, a man who had been taught ¹Mount Tmolus was in Asia Minor.

the Bacchic mysteries by Orpheus and by Eumolpus, a man from Athens.¹ Midas recognized him as a comrade,
his associate in the sacred rites, and was pleased to honour the arrival of his guest with joyful celebrations which lasted ten successive days and nights.
On the eleventh day, once Lucifer had ushered out the distant ranks of stars, Midas happily set out for Lydia,
where he gave Silenus back to Bacchus, the satyr’s youthful foster child. The god, pleased to have Silenus returned to him, gave Midas, as a favour, the chance to ask for any gift—a fine offer, but wasted, for Midas made poor use of this reward.
He said:

“Make all things my body touches change to yellow gold.”

Since this was his choice, Bacchus consented and granted Midas the harmful gift, sorry he had not asked for something better. However, the king from Berecyntia was happy as he left, joyful in his misfortune. He tested his belief in what Bacchus had promised by touching various things and, when he did,
could hardly comprehend the things he saw.
When on an oak he snaps a green twig off
a lower branch, the twig is changed to gold.
If he picks any rock up from the ground,
it, too, becomes pale gold, and when he grasps
a clod of earth, the power of his touch turns it into a lump of yellow metal.
He gathers in dry ears of Ceres’ grain,
and they become a harvest of pure gold.
He holds an apple taken from a tree,
and you would think he has received the fruit

¹Silenus was a satyr and a divine patron of drunkenness, who helped to raise Bacchus after he was taken out of Jupiter’s thigh. Eumolpus was a disciple of Orpheus and founder of the Eleusinian mysteries.
of the Hesperides.¹ When his fingers touch tall pillars by the door, they seem to glow,
and if he dips his hands in running streams, Danaë herself could well have been seduced
by the liquid gold flowing past his palms.²

Midas has trouble holding back the dreams
now active in his mind, for he imagines all things turned to gold. As he rejoices, his servants set tables out before him loaded with rich amounts of meat and bread.
But if he puts his hand on Ceres’ gifts, the bread grows hard. If his hungry jaws attempt to chew the meat, when his teeth touch,
a golden yellow plating coats his food.
And when he drinks pure water mixed with wine,
a present from the very god who gave him his new gift, you see a golden liquid flowing in his mouth. This strange disaster fills Midas with dismay. For all his wealth, he is a wretched man. He wants to flee from all his riches and now despises
the very things he recently desired.
No supply of food relieves his hunger,
his throat is burning with a parching thirst,
and he is plagued, as he deserves to be,
by the gold he now detests. He stretches his shining hands and arms up to the skies and cries:

“Forgive me, father Bacchus.
I have sinned. But pity me, I beg you.
Save me from this gift which seemed so fine!”

The will of the gods is kind. Once Midas had confessed his fault, Bacchus restored him and took back the present he had given to fulfill his promise. He told Midas:

“To make sure you are no longer covered with gold, as you so foolishly desired,

¹The Hesperides were three divine nymphs of the evening and western regions. They took care of a tree whose fruit was golden apples.
²Danaë was tricked by Jupiter, who had sex with her in the form of a shower of gold.
go to great Sardis, to the river there,
and make your way across the shining ridge.
Keep going upstream to the river’s source,
then plunge your head and body both at once right where the spring is frothing up the most,
and, as you do that, wash away your crime.”

Midas went to the spring, as he was told.
When the golden force moved from his human flesh and passed into the spring, its colour stained the waters of the stream, and even today, the lands absorbing grains from this old source gleam and harden in those spots where water flowing in the river soaks into the soil.

Midas now hated wealth and spent his time in fields and woods and mountain caves, where Pan is always present. But his wits remained as stupid as before, and his foolish mind was doomed to hurt its owner once again.

Tmolus, a towering, rugged mountain with panoramic views out to the sea has one flank extending down to Sardis and another reaching tiny Hypaepe.
Pan is there, boasting to some gentle nymphs about his songs and playing a modest tune on a pipe of reeds held in place by wax.
He dares to demean Apollo’s music in comparison with his own. And thus, it comes to an unequal competition in which Tmolus will select the winner.

The ancient judge sits on his mountainside and shakes his ears to rid them of their trees.
The only thing he wears in his dark hair is a wreath of oak, with acorns hanging by his hollow temples. He looks at Pan, the god of flocks, and says:

"No need to wait.
It’s time to judge.”
Pan plays his rustic pipes, and his wild tune fills Midas with delight (he happens to be there, close by the music). After that, sacred Tmolus turns his head towards Apollo’s face and, as he turns, his forests follow. Around his golden head Phoebus wears a wreath of Parnassus laurel. His garments, dyed with Tyrian purple, sweep along the ground. In his left hand he holds his lyre, inlaid with gemstones and Indian ivory, and in his right a plectrum. The very way he holds himself proclaims the artist. Then he plucks the strings with skilful fingers, and his sweet music captivates Tmolus, who then orders Pan to hold his pipes inferior to the lyre.

The verdict of the holy mountain god delighted all of them, except for Midas. He was the only one to disagree and say it was unfair. The Delian god could not allow such foolish ears to keep their human shape, and so he stretched them out, filled them with white hairs, made them flexible at the base, and gave them power to move. Midas was human in his other parts, but in this one feature he was punished, for he now carried plodding asses’ ears.

Midas was anxious to conceal this change and tried to mitigate his own disgrace with a purple turban around his head. But a servant, the one who trimmed his hair with iron scissors, saw what the god had done. Though he was keen to tell what he had seen, he did not dare divulge such shameful news. But still, he could not keep it to himself. So he went off alone, scooped out the earth, and in a whisper told the empty pit the kind of ears he had seen on Midas. He pushed the soil in place again and buried the news he had disclosed, then filled the pit and crept away in silence. But a thick patch of trembling reeds began to sprout up there, and in a year, when they were now full grown, they gave away the man who dug the hole. For when the gentle South Wind stirs those reeds, they repeat the words the servant buried and tell the truth about his master’s ears.¹

When Latona’s son had punished Midas, he left Tmolus, flew through the limpid air, and landed in the realm of Laomedon, on this side of the narrow strait of Helle, Nephele’s daughter.² An ancient altar stands between the western headland of Sigaeum and high Rhoeteum to the east, a shrine to Jupiter Panomphe, the Thunderer. Here Apollo noticed Laomedon building the first walls of his new city, Troy, a massive project which demanded arduous work and immense resources. And so he and trident-wielding Neptune, the father of the heaving sea, put on a human form and built the city walls for the Phrygian king, who had agreed to pay them gold to fortify the site. When the task was done, king Laomedon said he would not pay the gods their wages and, to complete his treachery, denied with outright lies what he had guaranteed. The king of sea cried out:

“You won’t do that and get away unpunished.”

So Neptune drove all the ocean waves against the coastline of greedy Troy, making the land a sea, washing away the farmers’ property, and burying their fields beneath his waves. This punishment was not enough for him, ¹The sound coming from the wind blowing in the reeds allegedly resembled the words “Midas has asses’ ears.”

²The land of Laomedon was Troy, and the strait of Helle was the Hellespont, just north of Troy. Helle was a daughter of Athamas and Nephele. She ran away from home (to escape her step-mother Ino) and was drowned in the sea which was from then on named after her.
so Neptune said that Laomedon’s daughter, Hesione, must be sacrificed, as well, to a monster from the sea. She was chained to a rough boulder but was later saved by Hercules, who asked for the reward he had been promised, since Laomedon had agreed to give him certain horses. But he refused to pay out the reward, though Hercules had served him very well. So Hercules attacked and conquered Troy and seized the walls of the defeated city, which had broken its word twice. Telamon, a man who fought alongside Hercules, did not depart without being honoured, for he won Hesione as his prize.

Now, Peleus, brother of Telamon, was already famous, for he had taken a goddess as his wife. The pride he took in his father-in-law was no less strong than what he felt about his grandfather, for Peleus was not, by any means, the only one whom providence had made grandson of Jupiter, but only he had had the luck to wed a goddess, too.¹

For old Proteus had said to Thetis:

“Goddess of the waves, get yourself with child! For you will be the mother of a youth who will achieve more than his father did, once he becomes a full-grown warrior, and will be called a greater man than he.”

Once he heard this prophecy, Jupiter—who did not want anyone in the world to be more powerful than he—avoided having a sexual affair with Thetis, goddess of the sea, even though he felt a fierce love for her burning in his heart.

¹Peleus, who was also a part of Hercules’s expedition against Troy, married Thetis, a minor goddess of the sea and a daughter of Proteus (a god of the sea). Peleus’ father, Aeacus, was a son of Jupiter. Telamon was also a grandson of Jupiter (he had been one of the Argonauts and had taken part in the Calydonian Boar Hunt with Meleager). Hercules was a son of Jupiter. Peleus is, in effect, claiming double honours from his two connections with divinities.
And so, to fulfill a promise he had made, he commanded Peleus, his grandson, son of Aeacus, to visit Thetis on his behalf, to hold her in his arms and make love with that virgin of the sea.

In Thessaly there is a curving bay, shaped like a sickle, with projecting arms, where there would be a harbour, if the sea were deeper there. The surface of the sand is covered by the waves. The shore is firm. It holds no footprints, does not slow one down, and has no seaweed. A grove of myrtle grows close by, with different coloured berries, and in the centre of it is a cave.

One cannot tell if it was made by nature or by human art, but probably by art. This place, Thetis, you would often visit, riding naked on a bridled dolphin. And Peleus found you here, lying down, overcome by sleep. He tried to win you with his entreaties, but you turned him down. So Peleus placed both arms around your neck, ready to use force, and his bold attempt would have prevailed, if with your usual skill you had not kept changing your appearance. At one point you became a bird, but Peleus still kept a firm grip on you in that shape, and when you turned into a massive tree, he held on with his arms around the trunk. But when, in your third change, you turned into a spotted tigress, that so terrified the son of Aeacus, his arms let go. So he poured wine into the ocean waves and, with sheep entrails and smoking incense, prayed to the sea gods, until Proteus, the Carpathian prophet, cried out to him from the ocean waves:

“Son of Aeacus, you will obtain the bride you’re looking for, if you catch her unawares, fast asleep in that cool cave of hers, and tie her up with cords she cannot break. Do not let her Proteus said this and then hid his face down in the sea, letting his own waters close over his last words.

The Titan Sun
was low in the sky, with his chariot pole
now slanting down, close to the western sea, as the beautiful nereid left the waves
and went inside her usual resting place.
Once Peleus had seized the young girl's arms, she kept on changing shapes, until she saw her limbs were tightly bound and both her arms pinned down on either side. And so, at last, she sighed and said:

“You could not conquer me without help from some god.”

Then she changed back and was Thetis once again. At that point, when she stood revealed in her true nature, Peleus held her, got what he desired,
and with her conceived the great Achilles.

Happy with his wife and son, Peleus was a man fortune blessed in everything, if one excludes the crime of killing Phocus.\(^2\)
But once guilty of his brother's murder,
his native country forced him into exile,
where he was welcomed by the land of Trachis, which Ceyx ruled, a son of Lucifer, a peaceful man who shed no blood. His face shone with his father's glow, but at the time he was not his normal self, for he was sad, mourning his brother's loss.\(^3\)

---

\(^1\)Carpathia was an island in the Aegean Sea.
\(^2\)Peleus had two brothers, Telamon and Phocus (all three were sons of Aeacus). Peleus killed Phocus by accident during a game. Ovid seems to suggest that the killing was deliberate.
\(^3\)Lucifer was the brightest star in the sky, prominent just before dawn.
reached there, worn out by worry and his trip, he left the cattle herds and flocks of sheep he brought with him in a sheltered valley close to the walls and then approached the town with few companions. When he got the chance for an initial meeting with the king, he went in as a suppliant, holding a wool-draped olive branch. He told the king his name and the family he came from, but did not divulge the killing and lied about the reason for his flight. He asked if he could stay there, either in the town or in the countryside. In his response, the king of Trachis dealt gently with him, saying:

“Peleus, our resources here are open even to the common folk, and the place I rule is kind to strangers. As well as these two things, you also bring the persuasive weight of a famous name—grandson of Jupiter. So waste no time in making a petition. All those things you ask for you shall have. What you see here, no matter what it is, is yours to share. Think of it as your own. I only wish the things you see were finer than they are!”

As Ceyx finished, he burst into tears. Peleus and his companions asked him what was causing him such heartfelt sorrow. The king gave this reply:

“That bird, the hawk—Daedalion the one which lives off prey and terrifies all other birds—you may perhaps believe it has always had its wings. But, in fact, the hawk was once a man (and since nature rarely changes, back then he was already fierce, an aggressive warrior in battle and well prepared for violent action. Daedalion was his name. The two of us were sons of Lucifer, the star who calls Aurora forth, the last to leave the sky.
I am a man of peace, and my concern was to preserve it and to love my wife. My brother got his joy from cruel war.

Kings and nations fell to his fierce power, that nature which, since he became a hawk, keeps anxious doves in Thisbe fluttering.¹

My brother had a daughter called Chione, fourteen years old and ready to get married. Because she was so beautiful, she had a thousand suitors. As it so happened, Apollo, returning back from Delphi, and Mercury, Maia’s son, travelling from the top of Mount Cyllene, saw her, both in the same instant, and the two gods, in that instant, both desired Chione. Apollo postponed his passionate hopes until the hours of night, but Mercury did not delay. He stroked the young girl’s face with the staff which brings on sleep. Chione, at that potent touch, lay prone and suffered Mercury’s assault. After that, once night had strewn the sky with stars, Apollo came, disguised as an old woman, and tasted those delights which Mercury had enjoyed before he got there. When Chione’s womb was ready to give birth, she bore Autolycus, a crafty child conceived from Mercury, wing-footed god, a son so devious, he was well skilled in every form of theft. His nature, no less scheming than his father’s, could make black things look white and white things black. Chione also bore a child to Phoebus (for she had twins), a boy called Philammon, famed for his melodious voice and lyre.

But what benefits did Chione obtain from having pleased two gods and given birth to a pair of boys or from being the child of a mighty father and the grandchild of a brilliant star? Is not such glory also harmful? It has injured many, and clearly it harmed her. For she was rash, ¹Thisbe was a town in Boeotia.

thinking she was better than Diana and criticizing how the goddess looked.
Diana, stirred to anger, told herself:

‘Let’s see if what we do brings her delight.’

She did not wait, but pulled back on her bow and shot an arrow from the string. The shaft pierced Chione through her presumptuous tongue, which then fell silent, for it made no sounds.
Whatever words it formed did not come out,
and as it tried to speak, the young girl’s life drained from her with her blood.

Filled with sorrow,
I put my arms around her. In my heart
I felt a father’s grief. With soothing words
I made an effort to console my brother, but what I said her father did not hear,
any more than cliffs take note of murmurs made by the sea. He bitterly lamented the daughter he had lost. But when he saw her body burning, he made four attempts to charge into the middle of the pyre, and all four times he had to be held back.
Then, in a mad escape, he ran away.
Like a young bull tormented by the stings of hornets on a neck chafed from the yoke, he charged off to places with no pathways.
And even then it seemed to me he ran faster than humans do—you could have thought his feet had wings. So he outran us all, made swift by his desire for death, and reached the summit of Parnassus. Apollo pitied him, and when Daedalion threw himself from a high cliff, he changed him to a bird and held him up as he was hovering on wings he had so suddenly acquired.
He gave him a hooked beak, curving talons instead of nails, greater physical strength, and left the courage he possessed before.
And now, as a hawk, he attacks all birds,
is merciful to none, and in his grief has become a source of grief to others.’
While the son of Lucifer was describing these strange things that happened to his brother, Antenor, a man from Phocis, who guarded Peleus’ cattle herds, came running up, out of breath, and yelled:

“Peleus! Peleus! Let me speak to you! A great disaster!”

Peleus told him to report his news, whatever it might be, while king Ceyx, with a worried face, waited in suspense. Antenor carried on:

“I had just driven the weary oxen down to the curved bay. The Sun was at his highest point, halfway on his daily path, as much behind him as he could see ahead. Some of the bulls were kneeling in yellow sand, relaxing and gazing at the broad expanse of sea. Others were slowly moving back and forth or wading in the waves, holding their necks high above the water. There is a temple hard by the shore, made from solid timbers, with no hint of gold or gleaming marble, and shaded by an ancient stand of trees. Nereids and Nereus live around there (a sailor drying nets on shore informed me they were the gods of that part of the sea). Near it is a marsh full of willow trees in a dense stand, where water from the sea which does not drain away has made a swamp. And from that place came fearful crashing sounds which terrified the neighbourhood, and then, out of that marsh, a monstrous wolf appeared, its deadly jaws spattered with slime and blood, a flaming red glare in its eyes. The beast was ravenous with hunger and with rage, but it was driven more by savagery and did not stop, for all its need to eat, beside the cattle it had killed and sate its deadly appetite, but rather slashed the entire herd and so ferociously it butchered all of them. A few of us trying to guard the herd were wounded, too, or else lay dead from fatal bites. The shore and the sea beside it both turned crimson.
So did the marshland filled with bellowing bulls.
It’s dangerous to delay! This business calls for us to act at once! Let’s form a group and arm ourselves. While something is still left, we must get weapons and in one large mass attack the beast with spears.”

The herdsman finished.

Peleus was not concerned about the loss,
but thinking of his crime, he realized the goddess Psamathe, still lamenting her son’s death, had brought on these disasters, as a sacrifice to murdered Phocus.\(^1\)

Ceyx, the Oetaean king, told his men to put their armour on and pick up weapons for the coming battle, while he himself prepared to join them. But Alcyone, his wife, alarmed by the commotion, ran out—
she had not taken time to fix her hair and kept pulling at it—clung to Ceyx, her arms around his neck, imploring him
in words and tears to provide assistance but not go himself, to protect his life and thus save both of them. So Peleus, son of Aeacus, said this to her:

“O queen,
this loving fear of yours is admirable, but set it to one side. These promises your husband made fill me with gratitude, but I do not want weapons to be used against this strange new monster. Instead,
I must placate the goddess of the sea.”

A lofty tower with a beacon fire stood on the summit of the citadel,
a welcome sight for weary ships at sea.
They climbed up there and groaned as they looked out

\(^1\)Psamathe, a nereïd, was the mother of Phocus.
BOOK ELEVEN

at cattle lying strewn along the shore
and at that savage beast with blood-stained jaws, its long fur caked with gore. From that high place, Peleus stretched his hands out to the beach,
towards the open sea, and prayed to Psamathe,
to end her anger and give him her aid.
But the goddess of the sea brushed aside
the pleas made by the son of Aeacus.
Then Thetis, by her intercession, won Psamathe’s forgiveness for her husband.
Though told to stop its murderous carnage, the wolf kept up the slaughter, driven mad
by the sweet taste of blood, until the goddess turned it to marble, as it sunk its teeth deep in the neck of a mangled heifer.
Its body stayed the same in every feature except its colour, and the white stone showed there was no need to fear the creature now, for it was a wolf no more. But the Fates did not permit the exiled Peleus to settle in that land. Still a fugitive, he moved on to the Magnetes and there the king of Thessaly, Acastus, granted absolution for his crime of murder.¹

Meanwhile, king Ceyx, whose heart is troubled by his brother’s fate and the strange events which followed, is making preparations for a journey to the god at Claros, in order to consult the sacred shrine,
which offers grieving mortals consolation.
For evil Phorbys and his Phlegyans have blocked the route to Delphi’s oracle.² Before he starts his journey, Ceyx tells his loyal wife what his intentions are.
Deep in her bones she feels an instant chill,
her face turns pale as boxwood, and her cheeks are moist from weeping. She tries to speak three times, with tears still streaming down her face, ¹Magnesia refers to a few different places. The one here is in Thessaly, in northern Greece.

²Claros, in Asia Minor, had a well-known shrine to Apollo. The Phelgyans were a group of people in Thessaly. Ceyx would normally go by land to consult Apollo at Delphi, which was closer and more famous than the shrine at Claros.
and as her sobs break up her fond complaints, she says:

“My dearest love, what fault of mine has changed your heart? Where is that care for me which used to be your first priority? Can you now go away without concern and leave Alcyone? Does a long trip now fill you with delight? And am I now more dear to you when I am far away? If I thought you were travelling by land, then I would only grieve, not be afraid. My worries would be free of dreadful fear. But oceans and the grim face of the sea I find so frightening. Just recently I saw ship timbers lying wrecked on shore, and on grave markers I have often seen the names of those whose bodies were not there.¹ You must not let your spirit place false trust in Aeolus, the son of Hippotas, your father-in-law, who, when he wishes, locks up the mighty winds and calms the waves.² For once winds are released and seize the sea, nothing holds them back. And then they threaten land and sea alike. They even agitate the heavenly clouds with fierce collisions and make the fiery lighting flash.³ The more I learn about them (and I do know the winds, for when I was a girl I often saw them inside my father’s home), the more I think we ought to be afraid. But if no prayers, my dear Ceyx, can change what you propose, if you are all too set on sailing off, then take me with you, too. At least then both of us will ride the storms together. I will fear the things I have to go through, but nothing else. And whatever happens ¹A memorial stone was an important way to honour the dead if there was no formal burial because the body was not available (as in the case of people lost at sea).

²Aeolus, god of the winds, was in other accounts the grandson of Hippotas.
³In some philosophical theories of Ovid’s time (e.g., in Lucretius) the winds were a major cause of all sorts of natural events from lightning to earthquakes.
we will bear together, and together we two will sail across the spacious sea.”

The words and tears of Aeolus’ daughter stirred her husband Ceyx, born of a star, for the fire of love in him was no less bright.
But he did not wish to scrap the journey
he planned to make across the sea or have Alcyone share the dangers of the trip.
His answered her with many soothing words, trying to ease her fearful heart. But still,
for all his effort, she did not agree.
The only part that moved his loving wife came when he added one more consolation:

“It’s true that all delays are long to us,
but I swear to you, by my father’s light,
if Fates allow me to return back home,
I will be here again, before the moon has twice filled in her sphere”

By promising this,
he spurred her hopes that he would be back soon.
He quickly ordered men to bring a ship down from the dock, launch it in the sea, and fit it out with gear. Alcyone looked on and shuddered, as if foreseeing
what the future held, and then, once again, shed floods of tears. She hugged her husband and, still utterly dismayed, said at last in a mournful voice:

“Farewell.”

Then she collapsed,
and all her body sank down to the ground.
While Ceyx was still seeking to delay,
the youthful crew, arranged in double rows, hauled their oars back against their sturdy chests and, with equal strokes, cut through the water.
Alcyone looked up with weeping eyes to watch her husband standing in the ship by the curving stern. When he waved his hand, she returned the wave. Further out from land, when she could not observe his features any more, her eyes kept following the moving ship, while they still could, and when she found it hard, as it kept going, to make out the ship, she kept on looking at the fluttering sails by the top part of the mast. And later, when her eyes could no longer see those sails, she went inside, to her empty bedroom, heart full of grief, and lay down on the bed. The bed and room brought back her tears again, for they made Alcyone remember the part of her that was not there.

By now the ship has cleared the harbour, and the wind has set the halyards stirring. The captain ships the sloping oars, raises the topsails to the masthead, and lets the sails fill out, to catch the coming breeze. But when the ship has sailed about half way across or less—no more than half, at most—and both coasts are far away, as night comes on, the sea begins to whiten with a heavy chop and the strong East Wind blows in more fiercely. The captain cries:

“Quick now! Lower the topsail! Lash all sails against the yards!”

He bellows his orders, but the wind howls in his face and drowns out his commands. The roaring sea makes any voice impossible to hear. But still, some sailors, on their own, move fast to stow the oars. Some reinforce the sides or furl the sails. One man bails out water and throws it back into the sea, another lashes down the spars. But while they do this, with no sense of order, the violent storm grows stronger. Angry winds attack the ship from every side and rouse the furious sea. Even the captain of the ship is fearful, for he has no idea how matters stand or what to order or forbid. They face such mighty perils, much more powerful than all his skill. The sound is deafening—men screaming, ship’s ropes groaning from the strain, waves crashing down in heavy seas, and thunder rolling through the sky. The heaving water seems to reach the heavens and spray the clouds, which hover overhead. At times, the seas turn yellow with the sand the storm churns up from deep below and then, at other times, are blacker than the river Styx, while waves, hissing with white foam, keep surging forward.
Chance blows batter that Trachinian ship, now lifting it way up, as if it stood on some high mountain peak and seemed to peer down in the valleys and the deepest pit of Acheron, then letting the ship drop down in a trough, with sea walls all around, as though the crew were gazing at the sky
from the bottom of an infernal gulf.
Waves from the raging sea pound on the hull,
again and again, with massive crashing, as loud as iron rams or catapults
when they assault a shattered citadel.
Just as savage lions gather their strength and charge at hunters armed with lowered spears, so storm waves surge ahead in rising winds,
as high as the ship, and even higher.
The wedges slip, and now, as wax is stripped,
seams open up, providing passageways for the deadly waves. Then, lo and behold, colossal rainstorms fall from melting clouds.
One might well think all heaven is pelting down into the sea and all the swollen seas are rising up to regions of the sky.
The sails are soaked, as water from the clouds is mixed with ocean waves. The upper air has lost its fiery stars, and the dark night is heavy with the blackness of the storm as well as its own gloom. But lightning bolts dispel the murk with flashes of their fire and make the waters glow as if they burn.
And then the waters breach the hollow hull and pour into the ship. Just as a soldier more daring than the rest, who often tries to scale walls of a city under siege, at last succeeds, gets what he wants, and then,
inspired by love of glory, takes the wall,
one man among a thousand, in the same way, 820
once nine waves in a row have crashed against the ship’s steep hull, a tenth wave surges in,
with even greater force, and does not stop 830 assaulting that exhausted, battered ship,
until it falls inside its captured walls.
So some of the sea keeps trying to get in,
and some of it is now inside the ship.
The whole crew is confused and terrified, 840
no less afraid than those inside a city
when troops outside are undermining walls, while other men are now inside, as well, occupying those walls. Their seamanship has failed them, and their spirits fall. It seems that death is charging at them, breaking in with each successive wave. One man cannot hold back his tears, another stands there dazed, while another calls those truly blessed for whom a proper burial is waiting.
One sailor offers prayers up to the gods, 850
raising his arms in vain towards the heavens
he cannot see, and pleading for their aid.
Some recall their brothers and their parents,
some their homes and children, or other things, whatever they have left behind. But Ceyx is stirred by memories of Alcyone—nothing but Alcyone is on his lips.
But though she is the only one he longs for, 860
he is glad she is not there. He would like to look back at his native shore, as well, and gaze one final time towards his home,
but he has no idea which way to look.
The sea is whirling round him with such force,
and the whole sky is hidden behind sheets of pitch-black clouds, thus doubling the darkness on the face of night. The gusting storm winds snap the mast, and the rudder breaks apart.
And now one final wave, like a conqueror eyeing spoils with keen delight, arches up, looks down on other waves, and then, as if 850
Pindus and Athos had been uprooted and their whole mass hurled out into the sea, crashes straight down, and with its force and weight, both together, strikes the ship and drives it to the bottom of the deep. Many sailors who go down with the ship are overwhelmed in the swirling water and meet their fate, without returning to the air. Others hold onto broken fragments of the wreck.

Ceyx himself clings to a piece of wreckage, with a hand that used to wield a sceptre, and calls out to his father, Lucifer, and to Aeolus, his father-in-law—alas, with no effect! But as he swims, his wife’s name, Alcyone, is the one most often on his lips. He thinks of her, speaks to her, prays the waves will bear his corpse where she will see it and, when he is dead, her loving hands will place him in his tomb. As long as he can open up his mouth while swimming in the waves, he keeps calling to Alcyone, though she is far away, and even as the waves close over him he is murmuring her name. Then, behold, a black arcing wall of water crashes down, right the middle of the roiling sea, buries his head below its bursting wave, and drowns him.

That day Lucifer was dim and could not be seen. He was not allowed to leave the heavens, so he hid his face behind a layer of thick cloud.

Meanwhile, Alcyone, daughter of Aeolus, knowing nothing of the great disaster, kept track of the nights, promising herself he would be coming home, an empty pledge. She hurried to make clothes—some for Ceyx, and some for her to wear when he got back. She piously gave incense to each god, 1Pindus and Athos were large mountains.

but, ahead of all the rest, she worshipped at Juno’s shrine, visiting the altars for a man who was no more and praying her husband would be safe, return back home, and love no other woman more than her.
Of all the prayers she made, this last one was the only one that could be granted.

But Juno could not bear to hear more pleas for someone dead, and, to free her altars from Alcyone’s ill-fated hands, she said:

“Iris, most faithful bearer of my words,
go quickly to the languid halls of Sleep.
Tell him to send Alcyone a dream
in the image of Ceyx, who is dead, to let her know the truth about his fate.”

Juno spoke. Iris put on a garment with a thousand colours and then, tracing her curved arc across the heavens, made for the home of Sleep, concealed beneath the clouds, as Juno had commanded.

Near the land
of the Cimmerians, there is a cave carved into the rock, a hollow mountain, the house and resting place of drowsy Sleep,
where the rays of Phoebus can never shine,
not when he is rising, or half way round,
or sinking down, a place where earth exhales mists mingling with the darkness, in a twilight of uncertain gloom. Here no crested cock calls for Aurora with his wakeful cries.
No voices of uneasy hounds or geese (more vigilant than dogs) break the silence, no wild animals, or cattle, or branches swaying in the wind, or strident noises from human tongues. There quiet silence reigns.
But from the very bottom of the rock streams of Lethe’s waters run, murmuring as they glide across the whispering stone, inducing sleep. In front of the cave door, rich beds of poppies grow, with countless herbs, and from their juices damp Night gathers sleep and scatters it across the darkened earth.
In the entire cavern there is no door, in case some moving hinge should make a noise, nor any watchman by the entranceway.
A bed stands in the middle of the cave, raised on black ebony, dark and downy, covered with black sheets, where the god himself is lying down, his limbs relaxed in sleep. Around him everywhere lie unformed Dreams resembling various shapes, as numerous as ears of harvest grain, or forest leaves, or particles of sand cast up on shore.

Iris entered and quickly pushed aside dreams standing in her way. Her splendid clothes filled the sacred home with light. The god Sleep had trouble lifting up his heavy eyes. He kept falling back to sleep again—once more his chin would droop and strike him in the chest. But finally he stirred and roused himself. Leaning on his elbow, he asked Iris (for he knew who she was) why she had come, and she replied:

“O Sleep, gentlest of gods, in whom all things find rest and minds find peace, who makes cares fly, who eases hearts of men worn out by heavy work, renewing them for further labour. Sleep, command a dream, which in its shape depicts the real man, to go to Trachis, city of Hercules, to Alycone, in the form of Ceyx, her king, and present to her the image of a ship destroyed at sea. This order comes from Juno.”

Once she had carried out what Juno ordered, Iris left the cave, unable any more to tolerate the power of Sleep. For once she noticed 1Trachis a city and region in central Greece was associated with and consecrated to Hercules because he and his wife Deianeira lived there.

that languid force creeping through her body, she fled and moved across the arcing path
by which she had arrived just moments earlier.

Then, from the huge crowd of his thousand sons, father Sleep roused Morpheus, an artist expert at imitating human shapes.
No one has more ability than he
at copying someone’s way of moving, his face, and speaking voice. To that he adds the person’s clothes and customary words.
Morpheus is the only one who copies human beings. Another son becomes a beast, turns into a bird, or changes to a serpent with a stretched-out body.
Gods call him Icelos. To mortal men his name is Phobetor. And a third son called Phantasos has yet another skill, for he can easily transform himself to earth and water, to stones and trees, to anything that has no life. These dreams are the visions that parade their faces to kings and generals at night, while others appear to citizens and common folk.
Ancient Sleep walked past these dreams and picked out his son Morpheus from all the brothers, to carry out what Iris had commanded.
Then he relaxed once more in gentle sleep.
His head drooped, as he collapsed on his high bed.

Morpheus flew through the night on silent wings and soon reached that city in Haemonia.
Shedding his wings, he then assumed the form of Ceyx. As pale as death and naked, he stood before his wretched wife in bed.
His beard looked soaking wet, and heavy drops of water dripped down from his sodden head.
With tears flowing from his eyes, he leant down and said to her:

“My most unhappy wife,
surely you still recognize your Ceyx, or has death changed my face? Look up here.
You will know me. But rather than your husband, you will find your husband’s shade! Your prayers, Alycone, were of no help to me, and I have died. Do not deceive yourself with promises I will be coming back! The cloud-filled South Wind in the Aegean caught my ship, tossed it with tremendous force, and broke it up. I vainly called your name, until the waves choked off my lips. This news comes to you from no doubtful messenger, nor are you hearing some uncertain rumour. I myself, a victim of that shipwreck, am telling you my fate. So rouse yourself. Come, weep for me, put on mourning garments, and do not send me off un lamented to the empty void of Tartarus."

These words Morpheus spoke in a voice which she believed must be her husband’s (and the tears he shed seemed genuine, as well). He also moved his hands in the same gestures Ceyx used. Alcyone groaned, shed tears, moved her arms, and tried to reach his body in her sleep. But all she held was air. She cried out:

"Wait! Where are you rushing? We’ll go together!"

Roused by her own voice and husband’s image, she shook off sleep. First, she looked around her, to see if the person who had just appeared was there, for her shout had roused her servants who brought in a lamp. After she had failed to find him anywhere, she struck her face with her own hand, ripped away the clothing covering her chest, pounded on her breast, and tore her hair without undoing it. When her nurse asked why she felt such grief, she screamed at her:

"Alcyone is no more! She is finished! She has been quite destroyed together with her Ceyx! Set aside all soothing words! He perished in a wreck."
I saw him! I recognized him! I stretched my hand to him as he was leaving here, eager to hold him back. He was a shade, but it was clear the shade was really him,
the ghost of my dead husband. If you asked, it's true he did not have his usual look—
his face was not as bright as earlier.
But in my misery I did see him,
pale and naked, his hair still dripping wet.
The poor man stood here, on this very spot.
Look here!"

She searched the room, trying to find some trace of footprints.

"This is what I feared.
My mind foresaw it. I kept begging you not to abandon me and chase the wind.
I truly wish you had taken me as well,
since you were sailing to your death. For me, going with you would have been much better,
for then none of my life would have been spent away from you, and death would not have found the two of us apart. I am not with you, so now I die. Though I am far away,
the waves are tossing me around, as well.
Without me there, the sea has taken me.
My mind would torture me more savagely even than the sea, if I attempted to live on any longer, if I struggled to subdue such overwhelming sorrow!
But I will not fight. I will not leave you, my poor Ceyx. At least now I shall come as your companion. If not in one urn, one funeral epitaph will join us,
and if your bones will not be mixed with mine,
we will still be there, my name touching yours."

Grief hindered her from saying any more.
Each word was interrupted by a sob,
and groans came from her suffering heart.

Morning came. Alcyone left her house and went down to the shore, seeking, in her grief, the place where she had watched her husband leave. She lingered there a while, saying to herself, “Here he untied the ropes. This stretch of beach is where he kissed me when he sailed away.”

While she is remembering his actions from their locations, she gazes out to sea and, far off in the waves, observes something which looks as if it is a human body.
At first she is not sure what it could be.
But once waves push it in a little closer, still some distance out, she can clearly see it is indeed a corpse. She does not know who the body is, but, moved by the omen of a shipwreck, as if she were in mourning for a total stranger, she says:

“Alas
for you, poor man, whoever you may be,
and, if you have a wife, for her, as well.”

The waves propel the body even nearer.
The more Alcyone keeps watching it,
the less and less she can control herself.
Now the body is carried close inshore.
Now she can make out who the person is.
She looks. It is her husband! She screams out,

“It’s him!”

She tears her face, her hair, her clothing—all at once—stretches out her trembling arms to Ceyx and then cries,

“O my dearest husband,
you poor man, is this how you come back to me?”

A man-made pile of rock along the shore broke the initial power of the waves, weakening the water’s force. Alcyone jumped out on it—that she could manage this was beyond belief—and she kept on flying, beating the gentle air with new-found wings.
Now a sorrowful bird she skimmed across the surface of the sea, and while she flew, from a slender beak her plaintive voice cried sounds of sorrow, like someone filled with grief. But when she touched the silent, bloodless corpse, she clasped the limbs she loved in her new wings and her hard beak kissed his cold lips in vain. People wonder whether Ceyx sensed this or whether it was the motion of the waves that made him seem to lift his countenance. But he surely felt it. So in the end, thanks to the pity of the gods above, they both were changed to birds. And even then, though they both met this fate, their love endured. The change did not dissolve their marriage ties. They still mate and raise their offspring, and now, for seven peaceful days in wintertime, Alcyone broods in her nest, floating atop the waves, which at that time are calm, for Aeolus keeps all the winds confined, prevents their leaving, and makes waters safe for his descendants.

Watching these two birds fly side by side across the spacious sea, an old man praised the love they had maintained right to the end. Then someone next to him, or perhaps it was the same old man, pointed to a long-necked bird and said:

"That bird you see skimming across the sea, trailing its thin legs behind, is a child of kings, and if you seek out his direct descent in a family line right down to him, he comes from Ilus, Assaracus, Ganymede (seized by Jupiter), old Laomedon, and then Priam, destined by Fate to reign in Troy's last days.¹ He was Hector's brother, and if as a young man he had not met a bizarre fate, he might perhaps have had a name no less illustrious than Hector's.

¹These are some of the best-known names in the royal family of Troy.
Though Hector was the son of Hecuba, Dymas’ daughter, men say that Aesacus was born in secret, in the shady groves below Mount Ida, to Alexirhoë, daughter of the two-horned Granicus.¹

Aesacus hated cities and spent his days far distant from the glittering palace, in far-off hills and humble rural places. He rarely went to crowded Ilium. But he was not uncouth, nor was his heart impervious to love. Often he would seek through all the forest glades to catch the nymph Hesperië, daughter of Cebrenus. He had observed her sitting on the banks beside her father’s river, in the sun, drying the wet hair spread across her shoulders. But when he looked at her, the nymph ran off, like a startled deer fleeing a tawny wolf or water ducks escaping from a hawk, who catches them far from the pool they left. The Trojan hero races close behind her, his feet made swift by love and hers by fear. But then, behold, a sly snake in the grass, as she races past, bites her in the foot with its curved fang and leaves its poison in her body. Her flight and life both end. The lover hugs the lifeless girl and cries:

‘It’s bad that I chased after you, so bad! But I did not expect something like this. Winning your love was not worth this to me. The two of us have brought about your death, unhappy girl. The snake gave you the wound, but I brought it about. And that makes me more guilty than the beast, unless I give you solace in your death by dying myself.’

Aesacus said this, and then threw himself from a rock into the sea, where pounding surf had eaten away the cliff. But as he fell, Tethys, moved by pity, gently caught him.

¹Granicus is a river in Asia Minor.
While he was in the sea, she covered him with feathers and would not give him the chance to die the way he longed to. The lover was incensed. He was being forced to live against his will, and his spirit, which yearned to leave its sad abode, was being blocked. Once new wings were growing on his shoulders, he flew up and, once again, hurled his body down into the sea. The feathers eased his fall. Enraged, Aesacus dove headfirst deep down. He kept on trying—and has never stopped—to find a route to death. Love made him thin, with elongated legs between the joints. His neck remains quite long and holds his head some distance from his chest. He loves the sea and still keeps hurling his body into it. From this he has acquired his name, the diver.”
BOOK XII

[Aesacus’s family mourn him; the Greek fleet remains at Aulis; a snake kills nine birds; Calchas prophesies; Iphigeneia is almost sacrificed; the home of Rumour; the Greeks reach Troy; Hector kills Protesilaus; Achilles and Cycnus fight; Cycnus is transformed; the Greeks have a banquet during a truce; Nestor tells how Caenis was changed from female to male, after being assaulted by Neptune; Nestor tells of the battle between Lapiths and Centaurs, of the achievements in that fight of Pirithoüs, Theseus, and Peleus, of Cyllarus and Hylonome, of Caeneus and Latreus, and of the transformation of Caeneus; Nestor tells Tlepolemus why he does not praise Hercules; Neptune tells Apollo to kill Achilles; Apollo shoots Achilles with the bow of Paris; Achilles dies and is cremated; Ajax and Ulysses claim Achilles’s weapons; Agamemnon orders the Greek leaders to adjudicate the quarrel.]

Priam, father to Aesacus, mourned his loss, not knowing he still lived on as a bird.

Hector and his brothers also offered pointless sacrifices at the burial site that bore his name.\(^1\) Paris was not present at this gloomy ceremony, the man who seized and carried off his wife and thus brought a long war back to his native land. A thousand allied ships came after him, carrying in one united group of men the full force of the Pelasgian race.\(^2\) The Greeks would not have waited for revenge, but fierce winds made the sea impassible, and so the fleet, which was prepared to sail, lingered in the fishing port of Aulis, in Boeotia. After they had prepared, in accordance with their native customs, a sacrifice to Jove and burning fires had made the ancient altar glow, the Greeks observed a dark-blue serpent slithering into a plane tree standing right beside where they had just begun the ritual. A nest high in the tree held eight young birds. The serpent seized these chicks and swallowed them in its gluttonous jaws—their mother, too,

\(^1\)The sacrifices are “pointless” because Aesacus is not dead and thus the ritual will not have the desired effect of helping him reach the Underworld.

\(^2\)Paris abducted Helen, wife of the Greek king Menelaus, and the Trojans refused to return her. Riley notes that different writers have offered different estimates of the size of the Greek fleet: Homer 1186, Dictys Cretensis 1225, and Dares 1140. Pelasgian is a common name for the Greeks (derived from the name for the original inhabitants of the area).
as she fluttered around her helpless brood.
All the men just stood there, stunned. But Calchas, Thestor’s son, who was a soothsayer, foretold
what would, in fact, occur:

“Rejoice, you Greeks.
We will prevail! Troy will fall. But our task will be a long one.”

He prophesied those birds—
all nine of them—must mean nine years of war.
The snake, while coiling around green branches in the tree, was turned to stone, preserving the image of a serpent carved in rock.

North Wind kept the waters turbulent in the Aonian sea and would not let the war fleet sail. Some believed that Neptune was sparing Troy because he built its walls.¹
But not Thestor’s son. For he understood—and did not hide the fact—for them to sail
they had to appease an angry goddess, placate a virgin with a virgin’s blood.² But when the demands of the public good had overpowered all natural feelings and the king had prevailed against the father, as Iphigeneia, her retinue in tears,
had taken her place before the altar,
ready to offer her innocent blood, the goddess changed her mind. She cast a cloud over their eyes in the middle of the rite, with men crowding in for the sacrifice and voices praying. Then, so people say, she made a switch and set a deer in place of that Mycenean virgin girl.³ And so, once a suitable victim had been killed and appeased Diana, her rage calmed down,

¹For the story of how Neptune helped build the walls of Troy see above 11.306. The Aeonian sea is a reference to the Aegean sea between Greece and Asia Minor.
²Agamemnon, king of Mycenae, the leader of the Greek expedition, had offended the virgin goddess Diana, who sent the winds to hold up the fleet until the appropriate sacrifice was made. Agamemnon was called upon to sacrifice his daughter, Iphigeneia.
³In some other famous versions of this story, Agamemnon does sacrifice his daughter. which eased the anger of the sea. The fleet of a thousand ships received a tail wind, sailed away, and after many hazards, finally reached the coast of Phrygia.

There is a place in the centre of the world, between earth, sea, and sky, at the limits of the three-fold universe where all things which exist anywhere, even far away, are seen and where all voices penetrate attentive ears. In this place Rumour lives. Here she has chosen herself a dwelling at the very summit of a citadel with a thousand entrances and doorways, but not a single gate to bar the way, so the place stands open day and night. Built out of echoing brass, it mutters, repeating voices and whispering sounds it has picked up. There is no quiet spot inside, no silence anywhere. But still, there is no loud din, only the subdued noise of voices murmuring, the kind of sound waves of the ocean often make when heard from far away or the rumbling produced by a final thunder roll when Jupiter makes the clouds collide. An unruly crowd fills up the halls, a fickle common throng, which comes and goes. A thousand rumours, combining falsehood with the truth, wander here and there, passing around misleading chat. Some of these fill empty ears with gossip, and some bear stories they have heard elsewhere. The number of made-up tales keeps growing, as every author alters what he heard by adding something new. Here one can find Credulity and hot-headed Error, empty Joy, alarming Fears, instant Sedition, and Whispers whose origin is unknown. Rumour herself sees everything going on in heaven, land, and sea, and asks about events the whole world over.

Since Rumour has already scattered the news that Greeks are underway with a strong force of men, when the armed armada sails into sight, it comes as no surprise. The Trojans there oppose the landing and defend the shore.
And you, Protesilaus, by Fate’s decree, are the first to fall, killed on Hector’s spear.
The fighting starts, at great cost to the Greeks, who learn of valiant Hector’s warlike heart
by the slaughter he inflicts, and the Trojans come to learn, from the loss of their own men, what a Greek right hand can do. Already the shores of Sigaeum are red with blood.
By this time Cycnus, a son of Neptune, has killed a thousand men. Achilles, too, has already launched a chariot charge and overwhelmed whole rows of fighting men with blows of his ash spear from Pelion, keen to clash with Hector or with Cycnus.
Achilles’ fight with Hector is delayed until the tenth year of the war, but now, in this first fight, he does cross paths with Cycnus.
As Achilles urges on his team of horses and their snow-white necks strain in the yoke, he aims his chariot right at the Trojans.
With right arm brandishing the quivering spear,
he gives a shout:

“Young man, whoever you are,
when you die, take this for consolation—
you have had your throat cut by Achilles, who comes from Thessaly!”

Achilles spoke.
His words were followed by his weighty spear.
Though no one could have seen a single flaw in the way he hurled the spear, the weapon he threw had no effect. Its sharpened point left nothing but a bruise on Cycnus’ chest, as if he had been struck by something blunt.
Cycnus shouted:

“O son of a goddess—
for we have heard reports of you already—why are you surprised I am not wounded?”
(For Achilles was, in fact, astonished).

“This helmet with its tawny horsehair crest, as you can see, affords me no protection, nor does this hollow shield on my left arm. They are mere ornaments, the very reason Mars himself will often dress in armour. If you strip me of this protective coat, I still will walk away without a wound. There is a benefit to being born, not from some nereid, but from the god who rules Nereus and his daughters, too, and all the ocean waves.”

Cycnus spoke these words, then hurled his spear at Peleus’s son. It lodged itself in his round shield of bronze, passing through metal and the next nine layers of cattle hide, and stopping at the tenth. Achilles shook out this spear, and once more his strong arm hurled a quivering weapon. But Cycnus’ body, once again, remained unharmed—there was no wound. And a third spear could not harm Cycnus, though he left himself exposed and vulnerable. Achilles blazed with rage, like a bull in the arena when its murderous horn strikes purple cloaks men use to make it angry and it sees the garment has escaped without a wound. He checked the spear to see if the iron point had fallen off. It was still fixed in place. He told himself:

“Well, then, is my hand weak? With this one man, has it lost the power it had before? For it was surely strong enough when in the foremost ranks I overthrew Lyrnessus’ city walls, or when I soaked Tenedos and Thebes, Eëtion’s city, in their own blood, or when Caicus’ stream flowed red from all the men I cut down there, 1This is a slur against Achilles, whose mother, Thetis, was a nereid, a daughter of Nereus and a minor sea goddess; whereas, Cycnus’s father was Neptune, god of the sea and of everything in it.

and Telephus twice felt the way this spear can do its work. And here, where so many have been slaughtered—my dead are lying in piles for everyone to see along the shore—my hand has proved itself and will stay strong!"

Achilles spoke. As if he had no faith in what had happened earlier, he hurled his spear right at Menoeetes in a crowd of Lycians standing across from him and pierced his body armour and his chest below the breastplate, both in the same blow. Menoeetes, as he lay in his death throes, hammered his head against the solid ground. Achilles pulled his spear from the hot wound and cried:

“This is the hand and this the spear which in this battle helped me win the day. These same weapons I will use to fight against that warrior, and I pray with him the result will be the same.”

Achilles spoke and tried to cut down Cycnus once again. The ash spear did not miss its mark, for Cycnus made no attempt at all to dodge the blow. This time the spear struck his left shoulder blade and bounced away, as if he were a wall or solid rock. Then Achilles noticed that where it struck the man was stained with blood, and he felt great joy. But all for nothing! There was no wound. It was Menoeetes’ blood!

Achilles, now truly in a rage, jumps headlong down from his high chariot, clutching his bright sword, seeking to battle Cycnus, his fearless enemy, up close, hand to hand. He sees his sword slicing shield and helmet, but Cycnus’ body is impervious and even starts to blunt his iron blade.

1Lyrenessus was a city close to Troy. Eëtion, king of Thebes (in Asia Minor, not the Thebes in Boeotia) was a Trojan ally. Achilles and the Greeks attacked and destroyed the city and killed Eëtion. The Caýcus was a river in Asia Minor. Telephus, a son of Hercules, was wounded by Achilles’ spear, but then healed by the rust on the spear point.
Achilles can go on like this no longer, so he pulls his own shield back and batters his adversary’s face three or four times, hitting his hollow temples with his sword hilt, pressing forward as Cycnus moves away, following close and throwing him off guard, harrying the man, giving him no rest from his confusion. Then fear grips Cycnus. Shadows swim before his eyes. As he moves backwards in retreat, a boulder standing in the middle of the field blocks his way. Achilles drives him back against this rock, bending his body, and with massive force turns Cycnus over, hurls him to the ground, then presses his hard knees and metal shield into Cycnus’ chest, pulls the helmet straps tight underneath his chin, squeezes his throat, cuts off his respiration, and chokes him. But when Achilles goes to strip the corpse of the man he has defeated, he sees the armour is quite empty. For Neptune, god of the sea, has transformed the body into a white bird, which we call Cycnus, a man’s name only moments earlier.¹

After this hard fight, there was a truce for several days. Both forces set aside their arms and rested. Vigilant sentries guarded Trojan walls, and alert pickets kept watch beside the trenches of the Greeks. Then a day of celebration came, in which Achilles, the conqueror of Cycnus, was appeasing Pallas, offering blood from a cow he sacrificed. Once he’d placed the inner organs on the blazing altars and that smell gods love had climbed to heaven, part of the meat was held back for the rite and the rest served out on dining tables. The leaders, lying back on couches, filled their bodies with well-cooked meat and dissolved their thirst and cares with wine. No cithara ¹The is Ovid’s third account of the transformation of a man called Cycnus into a swan. For the other two see 2.530 and 7.599.

or singing voices or long boxwood flute with many holes was there to entertain them.
Instead, they spent the night in conversation,
and the subject they discussed was courage.
They talked of their own battles and those fought by enemies and often got great joy from recalling, each in turn, the dangers they had encountered and endured. What else would Achilles talk about? And what else would other men prefer to talk about in the company of great Achilles?
Their discussion focused, first and foremost,
on his recent triumph, the overthrow of Cycnus. They all found it astounding that the young man’s body could not be sliced
by any weapon, was impervious to wounds, and made steel blunt. Achilles and the Greeks were marvelling at this, when Nestor said:

“Cycnus was the only warrior your age who could shrug off a sword and not be cut by any blow. But in earlier times I myself saw Thessalian Caeneus absorb a thousand blows without a wound appearing on his body. Yes, Caeneus, that Thessalian, famous for his exploits, lived on Othrys. What was more amazing about the man was this—when he was born, he was a female.”

All those warriors there,
intrigued with such a strange phenomenon,
entreated Nestor to recount the story.
Along with other men, Achilles said:

“Come now, tell us! You eloquent old man, the wisdom of our age, all of us here have the same desire to learn the details.
Who was Caeneus? Why was he transformed to the opposite sex? In what campaign, in whose battles, did you get to know him?
Who prevailed against him? Did anyone fight him and prevail?”
Old Nestor said:

“Although my slow old age gets in the way and many things I saw in earlier years escape me, I still remember most of them. I have lived through two centuries and now can make one witness numerous events. But among so many acts in battle and at home, nothing is more firmly fixed here in my mind than that.

Virgin Caenis, child of Elatus, was celebrated for her beauty, the loveliest young girl in Thessaly, and one courted in vain by jealous hopes of several suitors in neighbouring towns—in your cities, too, Achilles (for she was of your people). Perhaps Peleus also might have tried to win her, but he had already married your mother, or else by then they were betrothed. Caenis refused to marry anyone. But, so people claim, while she was walking along a lonely shore, the god of the sea assaulted her, and then (the same story goes on to say) once Neptune had enjoyed this new sexual affair, he said to her:

‘You can ask for anything you desire, and I will not refuse. Choose what you wish.’

So Caenis answered:

‘This attack on me makes me really wish I never suffer one like it again. So grant me this—that I am not a woman. With that gift, you’ll be offering everything I want.’

---

1Nestor’s old age at the time of the Trojan War was legendary. In Homer’s depiction of him, he has ruled over his people for three generations (not for three centuries), a detail that would probably make him about 75 years old.
She spoke those last words in a harsher tone.
One could have thought the voice came from a man, as indeed it had. The god of the deep seas had by this time agreed to grant her wish,
and, in addition, now she was a man, Neptune ensured that he could not be hurt
by any wound or slain by any sword.
Delighted with this gift, Caeneus left.
He roamed through the Thessalian countryside and spent his time on things which men enjoy.

Now, Pirithoüs, bold Ixion’s son, had married Hippodamia and asked those savage creatures, the cloud-born centaurs, to sit in proper order at some tables
set out in a cave sheltered by the trees.
Thessalian leaders came, and so did I.¹ Crowds of unruly celebrating guests filled the royal home with noise. As they sang the marriage song and fires filled the hall with smoke, the virgin bride appeared, a girl more lovely than the others, surrounded by a group of newly married women and older wives. We said Pirithoüs was fortunate to have her as his bride,
a prophecy which almost proved a lie.
For your heart, Eurytus, you most savage of the savage centaurs, was hot with wine,
as well as from the sight of that young girl,
and you were ruled by drunkenness and lust.
Suddenly the tables were knocked over,
and the feast became a brawl. The new bride was hauled away by force, dragged by the hair.
Eurytus snatched Hippodamia, while others seized whichever woman there they fancied or could lay their hands on. The place looked like a looted city—sounds of women screaming echoed through the house. We jumped up quickly—all of us—and Theseus first cried out:

¹The Centaurs had the head, torso, and arms of a human being and the body, legs, and tail of a horse. Both the Centaurs and Pirithoüs were descended from Ixion. They had quarreled before over family properties.
The phrase "cloud born" refers to the fact that, according to some accounts, the Centaurs were born from Ixion and a cloud in the shape of Juno. Jupiter made the cloud to direct Ixion’s attention away from Juno, whom Ixion was keen to attack sexually.
‘Eurytus, what mad fit is forcing you to injure Pirithoüs with me here, still living, and, in your stupidity,
to cause offense to both of us at once?’

In case what he’d just said had no effect, brave Theseus pushed aside the centaurs who hemmed him in and grabbed the young girl back from those mad creatures taking her away.
Eurytus said nothing (he could not defend the sort of thing he’d done by using words).
Instead, his shameless fists attacked the face of the girl’s protector and struck his noble chest.
By chance an ancient mixing bowl was there,
its rough surface covered with embossed designs in high relief. Theseus raised it up (it was huge, but he was even larger) and threw it right in the centaur’s face.
Eurytus collapsed and lay there on his back,
while gobs of blood, as well as brains and wine, came pouring from his mouth and wounded face
and his feet kept drumming on the soaking floor.
His brother centaurs, with two sets of limbs, incensed at Eurytus’ murder, all shouted with a single voice:

‘To arms! To arms!’

Wine gave them courage. As the fight began, cups, basins made of bronze, and fragile jars went flying through the air. Things set down there to adorn a feast were now being used to slaughter men in battle.

The first one
bold enough to strip away the offerings from the innermost shrine was Amycus, Ophion’s son. He began by taking from that sanctuary a torch densely packed with blazing fire. He lifted it high up, like someone with a sacrificial axe trying to break the white neck on a bull, and brought it down, fracturing the forehead of Celadon, a Lapith, and left him with his facial bones smashed in and shattered beyond all recognition.¹ His eyes bulged out, and bones around his mouth, as they were crushed, had forced his nose back into the centre of his palate. Pelates from Pellas, tore off a maple table leg, struck Amycus, and knocked him to the ground, forcing his chin hard against his chest. Then, while Amycus was spitting out his teeth and blood, Pelates hit him once again, and that second blow dispatched him to the shades of Tartarus.

Next Gryneus stood there with a grim face staring at the smoking altar. He cried:

‘Why don’t we use this?’

He raised the altar—

it was immense—and threw it, fires and all, into the middle of the Lapith ranks, crushing two of them, Broteas and Orius. Orius’s mother was Mycale, whose incantations, people used to say, had frequently brought down the crescent moon, despite its struggles.² Exadius then cried:

‘You’ll not get away with that unpunished, not if I can lay hands on a weapon!’

He had no spear, so he seized the antlers of a stag hanging on a lofty pine tree as an offering to the gods. Using these, he drove two points in Gryneus’s face, gouging out his eyes—one stuck on the horn, the other slid onto his beard and hung there, soaked in blood.

Then, lo and behold, Rhoetus snatches up a blazing log of plum wood burning in the middle of the altar and, swinging from the right, hits Caraxus ¹The Lapiths were a tribe in Thessaly.

²According to popular belief, lunar eclipses were caused by witches stealing the moon.
where the yellow hair conceals his temple.¹
His hair, set alight by the rapid flames, burns like dry fields of grain, while in the wound
the blood gives off a dreadful hissing noise, as it burns up, the same way iron sounds
when a smith with crooked tongs picks up a piece still red hot from the fire and plunges it down in the trough—once immersed in liquid, it spits and hisses in the lukewarm water.
Caraxus, though hurt, shakes the eager flames from his tousled hair, tears up slab of stone set as a threshold in the ground, and lifts it shoulder high—it would have filled a wagon—but its huge weight prevents him tossing it far enough to reach the ones he wants to hit.
But the massive stone does crush Cometes,
a friend of his, standing close beside him.
Rhoetus does not hold back his joy and shouts:

‘I hope that crowd of yours, the other people in your camp, are all as strong as he is’!

Then he attacks Caraxus once again with the half-burned log, battering his head again and again with damaging blows, splitting the sutures in the Lapith’s skull,
till bones sink down inside his oozing brain.

Triumphant Rhoetus now shifts his gaze to Euagrus and Corythus and Dryas, too.
He first knocks over Corythus, a lad whose cheeks have their first covering of down.
Euagrus cries:

‘What glory do you win
by slaughtering a boy?’

But Rhoetus
stops him saying any more, by shoving
the burning wood right in his open mouth, as he is speaking, and then driving it viciously through his mouth into his chest.

¹Rhoetus was a centaur.
Then, savage Dryas, he goes after you, as well, waving the fire around his head. But with you he does not get the same result, for, as he is boasting of his success in killing all those men, you stab at him with a fire-hardened stake where his neck and shoulder meet. Rhoetus gives a groan and with some difficulty pulls the stake away from the hard bone, then runs away, soaked in his own blood. Orneus also flees, along with Lycabas and wounded Medon, hit in his right shoulder, with Thaumas, too, and Pisenor, as well as Mermerus, who recently could conquer anyone in running, but who moves more slowly now from the wound he has received. Pholus flees, with Melaneus and boar-hunting Abas, and the prophet Asbolus, who has tried, without success, to keep them from a fight. Nessus, too, is running away, afraid of being wounded. To him Asbolus cries:

'Do not run off. For you will be quite safe—you’re slated for the bow of Hercules.'

But some did not escape their death—Lycidas, Eurynomus, Areus, and Imbreus—all these centaurs were cut down by Dryas with his right arm, when they confronted him. You, too, Crenaues, though you turned to flee, were wounded in the front, for you looked back and got a heavy spear between the eyes, right where your nose and lower forehead join.

In the middle of this massive uproar, Aphidas lay there and did not wake up, his whole body sunk in a timeless sleep. His limp left hand still clutched a cup of wine, and he was stretched out on a shaggy hide of a bear from Ossa. Seeing him there, from some distance off, lying motionless

---

1 The point here is that Nessus is destined to be killed by Hercules and thus will not die in this fight. For Ovid’s story of Hercules and Nessus, see 9.164 ff.
and no use in the fight, Phorbas slipped his hand inside his javelin thong and shouted:

‘Drink your wine with water from the Styx!’

And with no more delay, he hurled his spear straight at the youthful lad. Now, Aphidas, as it so happened, was lying on his back, so the ash shaft tipped with steel was driven deep into his neck, and he perished there without feeling a thing. From his full throat the dark blood poured and dripped onto the couch and down into the wine cup in his hand.

I myself saw Petraeus trying to lift an oak tree full of acorns from the earth. While his arms were round the tree, moving it back and forth, working on the loosened trunk, a spear from Pirithoüs pierced his ribs and pinned his writhing chest to solid wood. People say that Chromius and Lycus were both slain by valiant Pirithoüs, but neither of those centaurs gave the victor as much glory as he got from killing Helops and Dictys. Helops was transfixed by a javelin thrown at him from his right. It drove itself in his left ear and pierced his temples. Dictys was running away, afraid of Perithoüs, Ixion’s son, who was coming after him, but tripped up on a steep mountain ridge and fell headlong down the slope. His heavy body split apart a huge mountain ash and the fractured tree impaled him in the groin.

Aphareus moves up to avenge the death of Dictys. He takes a rock ripped from the mountainside and tries to throw it, but as he does this, Theseus, son of Aegeus, strikes him with his oaken club and breaks the huge bones in his elbow. There is no time to pause, and Theseus has no desire to slaughter Aphareus, whose body is now harmless.
So he leaps up on tall Bienor’s back, which is not used to bearing anyone except Bienor, presses his knees hard into the creature’s ribs, while his left hand seizes the centaur’s hair and holds on tight. Then using his knotted club, Theseus batters his face and mouth (still shouting threats) and hits his solid temples. With this same club he knocks over spear-throwing Lycopes, Nedymnus, Hippasus (whose flowing beard protects his chest), Ripheus (a huge beast taller than the trees), and Thereus, who in Thessaly grabs wild mountain bears and carries them home, alive and kicking.

Demoleon could no longer bear to see Theseus having such success in battle. Using all his strength, he tried to rip up the sturdy trunk of an ancient pine tree. When that effort failed, he broke off the trunk and threw it at Theseus, who had moved back some distance from the approaching missile. He had been warned by Pallas to withdraw (that, at least, is what he hoped men would believe). But the tree trunk did not miss completely. It fell against tall Crantor’s chest and shoulder, severing his neck. That man, Achilles, had once been your father’s armour bearer, given to Peleus by Amyntor, king of the Dolopes, as surety, to guarantee the peace. When Peleus, from a distance, saw Crantor cut apart with such a dreadful wound, he cried:

‘Crantor, the youth I cherish most, at least accept this tribute to the dead.’

Then, with all his strength, his powerful arm threw his ash-wood spear straight at Demoleon. It pierced his ribs and stuck in there, quivering in the bones. He pulled it out, but could not find the tip (removing the shaft was difficult enough), so the point stayed there, stuck inside his lung. Pain made Demoleon even more enraged. Though wounded, he went after Peleus, rearing to kick him with his horses’ hooves. Peleus absorbed the echoing blows on shield and helmet, striving to protect his upper chest. He held his weapons out in front of him and with a single blow through his enemy’s shoulder blade he speared that creature with a double chest. By now, before this fight, he had already killed Hyles and Phlegraeus from a distance, and Clanis and Iphinoüs hand-to-hand. To these he added Dorylas, who wore a wolf-skin hat and, rather than a spear, carried a splendid set of crooked ox horns dyed red from so much blood.

Now, my courage made my spirit strong, so I shouted out to Dorylas:

‘See how much your horns fail to match my steel!’

I hurled my spear at him. He could not avoid the blow, so he raised his right hand to his forehead to ward off the wound he would receive. But then his hand was pinned against his head. He screamed in pain, but Peleus (who stood quite close to him), seeing him struck like that and overcome by such a vicious wound, hit Dorylas with a sword thrust right below his belly. The furious centaur charged at Peleus, dragging his guts along the ground, but then, while trailing his own entrails, stepped on them, and, as he did that, ripped them all apart and got his legs entangled. He collapsed with nothing left inside his abdomen.

\[390\]

1 The centaur has two chests—one of a human being and one of a horse.
And your beauty did not save you, Cyllarus, not in that fight, if we, in fact, concede a nature like your own is beautiful. His downy yellow beard was just beginning, and golden hair hung from his shoulder blades half way down his flanks. His face was pleasing, young and vigorous. His neck and shoulders, his hands and chest, and all his human parts looked like artistic statues men so praise.

Nor was his horse’s body down below flawed or less noble than his human form. With a horse’s head and neck, he would be fit for Castor. His back deserved a rider, as did his deep and finely muscled chest.¹ He was completely black, more so than pitch, except for his white tail and snowy legs. Many females of his species courted him, but one made him her own, Hylonome. There was no female lovelier than her among those hybrid beasts in the deep woods. She was the only one who held his heart with her endearments, giving him her love and telling him how much she was in love, and by taking care of her appearance (as much as that was possible for her with those limbs she had). She would use a comb to smooth her hair and sometimes deck herself with rosemary or violets or roses, and sometimes wore white lilies. Twice a day she washed her face in fountain streams falling from the high forest ridge of Pagasae and dipped her body in the flowing water. On her left flank or shoulders, she would wear wild creature’s hides which she would choose with care to made her look attractive. Both of them loved equally. Together they would roam the mountains and explore the caves. And now they both had come into that Lapith home and together both had joined the fighting. But now a javelin thrown from the left (just who hurled the missile is uncertain) hit you, Cyllarus, right below the spot where your neck and chest both meet. When the weapon was pulled out, your heart, though slightly wounded, lost it vital heat, and your whole body froze. Hylomone quickly held his dying limbs, placed her hand against the wound to close it, and moved her mouth to his, in an attempt to stop his spirit flying away. But then, when she saw he was gone, she said some words which the noise prevented me from hearing, threw herself onto the spear which had killed her husband, and as she died, embraced him.

¹Castor, son of Helen and Zeus, was famous for his horsemanship.

Another centaur stands before my eyes—Phaeocomes, who had knotted together six lion skins, as a protective cover for both man and horse. He hurled a huge log (two teams of oxen would hardly shift it) and hit Tectaphus, a son of Olenos, crushing the very top part of his head [and shattering the broad roof of his skull. The soft stuff in his brain came oozing out, through his eyes and ears and hollow nostrils, just like curdled milk passing through oak twigs or viscous liquids pressured in a sieve seeping through dense openings in the mesh.]

But as Phaeocomes was getting ready to strip the armour from dead Tectaphus—your father knows this story—I plunged my sword into his lower gut. And my sword killed Teleboas and Chthonius, as well. Chthonius was waving a two-forked branch, and Teleboas had a spear. Look here. That is the scar from a wound he gave me. It’s still visible, that old mark he made. Those were the days I should have been sent off to capture Troy. Back then I had the strength, if not to take the city, at least to check great Hector’s weapons with my own. But he, in those days, had not yet been born or else was just a boy. Now age has made me frail.

---

1 Some editors have cast doubt on the authenticity of these lines.
Why should I tell you about Periphas, who overcame the centaur Pyraethus, or talk of Ampyx, who drove his cornel spear, without a point, into the opposing face of four-footed Echeclus? Macareus slaughtered Erigidupus from Pelathron by burying a crowbar in his chest.1
And I remember how a hunting spear from the hand of Nessus hit Cymelus deep in his groin. And you should not believe that Mopsus, son of Ampycus, was just a man who prophesied what was to come, for his throw killed the centaur Hodites, who tried to speak, but failed, because the spear went through his tongue, pinned it against his chin, and fixed his chin against his throat.

Caeneus had slaughtered five—Styphelus and Bromus, Antimachus, Elymus, and Pyrcmus (armed with a battle axe). I don’t recall their wounds, but I kept track of the number and their names. Then Latreus charged forward, a centaur with massive limbs and body, decked out in the armour he had stripped from a warrior he had killed, Halesus, who came from Thessaly. He was mature, between old age and youth, with streaks of gray across his temples and a young man’s strength. His shield, helmet, and Macedonian spear made him stand out. He rode around in circles, facing each battle group in turn, clashing his weapons and, in his arrogance, shouting all sorts of gibes into the empty air:

‘Do I have to put up with you, as well, Caenis? Yes, I called you Caenis, because to me you will always be a woman. That’s how I think of you. Does not your birth remind you and do you not think about the act which brought you this reward, the price you paid for this false image of a man?’

1Pelathron was a region of Thessaly.
Consider what you were when you were born or what you suffered, then go and take up your spinning wheel and baskets. Use your thumb to twist the yarn. Leave warfare to the men.’

While Latreus was taunting him like this,
Caeneus hurled his spear and hit the centaur,
where horse and man were joined, wounding his side
as he was running at full stretch. Latreus, mad with pain, tried to strike the exposed face of the Thessalian youth with his long spear.
But the spear just bounced away, like hailstones from a roof or some small pebble striking a hollow drum. Latreus moved in close and strove to hit Caeneus by thrusting his sword in his impenetrable side.
But there was no place the sword could enter.
The centaur cried:

‘You still won’t get away!
Since my point is blunt, I will destroy you with the blade.’

Turning his sword blade sideways,
he reached out with his long right arm to slash Caeneus in the gut. The blow re-echoed, as if the sword had struck a marble body.
When the blade hit Caeneus’ hardened skin
it shattered into pieces.

Once Caeneus
had exposed his body long enough and,
much to his enemy’s astonishment, received no wound, he shouted:

‘Come on now,
let me test your body with my steel!’

He drove his lethal sword up to the hilt in the centaur’s flank, twisting and turning the buried weapon in his flesh, redoubling Latreus’s wounds. Then, lo and behold, with a huge shout, the furious centaurs all charged up, hurling and thrusting weapons against one man. Their spears fell down, blunted, and Caeneus, son of Elatus, stood there unhurt. None of their weapons had drawn blood. The centaurs were astonished at this marvel. Monychus cried out:

What a huge disgrace!
We are a whole group of people beaten by someone who is not a real man.
But now, thanks to our pathetic efforts, we are what he used to be. What’s the point of our powerful limbs, our double strength, our hybrid nature which combines in us the strongest animals of living things.
I do not think our mother was goddess or we are Ixion’s sons. He was a man so great he set his hopes on mighty Juno, and we are conquered by an enemy who is just half a man. Roll rocks and trees on him, entire mountains, too! And squeeze the living spirit out by throwing wood.
Let piles of logs press down his throat. Their weight will end his life instead of wounds.’

As Monychus finished, he raised a tree, which, as it so happened, had been blown down by the furious power of the violent South Wind, and hurled it at Caeneus, who did not back away.
The entire crowd of centaurs did the same, and soon Mount Othrys was devoid of trees and Pelion had no more shade. Caeneus, overpowered by the enormous heap, is struggling underneath that weight of wood. His hardy shoulders hold up the pile of oak, but once the mound climbs up above his mouth and higher than his head, he has no air which he can draw upon to breathe. At times he tries—without success—to lift himself into the air and shake off all the trees heaped there on top of him and sometimes shifts the pile, just as we see Mount Ida when, lo and behold, it starts to shudder and the whole earth shakes. How his story ended is not clear. Some people claim his body, crushed by that pile of wood, was driven down to the void of Tartarus. But Mopsus, son of Ampycus, denied this. For he observed a bird with tawny wings fly from the pile up into the air. I saw it, as well (that was my first and final sight of it). When Mopsus saw the bird flying lazily around his camp, gazing down and making a loud noise, his eyes and spirit followed it, and he called out:

‘Hail to you, Caeneus, glory of the Lapith race, a great man once, but now the one bird of your kind.’

We believed this was the truth, because we trusted Mopsus. Grief increased our anger. We were incensed one man had been assaulted by so many, and we did not stop slashing with our swords to vent our rage till half our enemies had been killed and the rest had run away and scattered under cover of the night.”

As Nestor was talking about this fight between the Lapiths and half-human centaurs, Tlepolemus, upset because the story made no mention of his father, Hercules, remarked:

“Old man, it astonishes me that those tales you tell leave out any praise for Hercules, because I well recall my father often used to talk to me about the cloud-born centaurs he had killed.”

Nestor answered sadly:

“Why force me to remember sorrowful events, which open once again those wounds which time has healed and to reveal my hatred for your father, whose actions were so damaging to me? By the gods, that man accomplished things beyond belief.
The world is full of praise for Hercules!
I wish I could deny it. But we Greeks do not laud Deiphobus or Polydamas or even Hector, for what man ever praised his enemies?

Once that father of yours destroyed Messene’s walls and overwhelmed two harmless cities—Pylos and Elis—demolishing my home with fire and sword.
I will not mention other men he killed,
but Neleus had twelve sons, all of us outstanding younger men, and all twelve, except myself, fell before the power of Hercules. Of course, one must accept that those others could have been defeated, but Periclymenes’ death was really odd.
Neptune, who founded the family line of Neleus, had given this young lad the power to take on any shape he liked and to discard it and change back again.
Well, after Periclymenes had changed into every shape, in a vain attempt to flee from Hercules, he turned himself into that bird which Jupiter so loves, the one whose hooked claws usually bear the lightning bolt. Using that bird’s power, its wings, its crooked beak, and curving talons, he tore at Hercules’s face. But then,
as his wings carried him up to the clouds and he hovered there, the man from Tiryns took his bow that never misses and shot.
He hit him where the wing and side are joined.
He was not killed, but the wound had severed the sinews, which now no longer functioned and could not move—they lacked the strength to fly.
He fell back to the earth. His injured wings could not beat the air, and then the arrow, which was still clinging lightly to his wing,
was driven inward by his body’s weight,

1Deiphobus, Polydamas, and Hector were important enemies of the Greeks at Troy, especially Hector, the Trojans’ leader and their finest warrior.
straight through his upper chest into his neck on the left-hand side.

Now, you most glorious leader of the fleet from Rhodes, does it seem to you I ought to sing in praise of Hercules and his great deeds? But I am not seeking to avenge my brothers any further than keeping quiet about those exploits. You and I, we share a solid friendship.”

When Nestor, in that sweet-toned voice of his, had finished, the warriors turned once again from telling stories to the gift of Bacchus. Then they got up, left their couches, and spent the remainder of the nighttime fast asleep.

But the god who with his trident governs the waters of the sea was sick at heart, grieving with a father’s sorrow for the son whose body he had changed into a swan (like Phaëton’s friend, the son of Sthenelus).¹ He despised savage Achilles and nursed, in his memory, a rage against him which was excessive. So now, when the war had been dragging on for about ten years, he spoke to Smintheus, long-haired Apollo, with the following words:²

“O you, who are by far the dearest to me of my brother’s children and with me built the city walls of Troy, which will not last, are you not sad to see that citadel about to be destroyed?³ Do you not lament the many thousands who died defending those same battlements? I will not name them all, but does your mind

¹Ovid is here bringing together two of the three different accounts of the transformation of someone called Cycnus. Neptune is mourning his son Cycnus, whose story is told earlier in this book (see 12.111 ff.). Phaëton’s friend, Cycnus, son of Sthenelus, has no relationship to Neptune (for his story see 2.530 ff.). I have added a few words in line 896 of the English, to clarify this point, which is somewhat confusing in the Latin.
²Smintheus was an epithet for Apollo. Its precise meaning is unclear ("killer of field mice," perhaps).
³For Ovid’s account of how Apollo and Neptune built the walls of Troy see 11.294 ff. ever think of Hector’s shade, that hero dragged past the walls of his own Pergamum?¹
And yet that fierce Achilles still survives, a more destructive man than war itself, the one who wipes away the work we did. Let him face me and feel what I can do with my triple-pointed spear! However, since we are not permitted to confront our enemies in combat hand-to-hand, you should kill him when he is not looking with a secret arrow!”

The Delian god, responding to his uncle Neptune’s feelings and his own, as well, nodded his assent. Concealing himself in clouds, Apollo moved among the ranks of Trojans and there, in the middle of the men being slaughtered, saw Paris shooting arrows now and then at unimportant Greeks. The god revealed he was divine and said:

“Why waste your arrows shedding blood of common soldiers? For if you are concerned about your family, you should pay attention to Achilles and avenge your slaughtered brothers.”

The god said this and pointed to the son of Peleus mowing down Trojan bodies with his sword. Then he turned Paris’s bow towards him, and the god’s death-dealing hand directed the unerring arrow at Achilles. And now the old man Priam could rejoice for the first time since his son Hector died.

And so you, Achilles, who have overcome such powerful men, are finally slain by a cowardly thief who snatched away a Grecian wife! If the Fates ordained ¹The Pergamum was the citadel in Troy, the highest point in the city. When Achilles killed Hector, he dragged him around his camp a number of times.

a woman’s hand would kill you in that war, you’d prefer to die from a battle axe in the hands of a warrior Amazon queen.¹

And now Achilles, grandson of Aeacus, the man who has terrorized the Trojans, the great glory of the Greeks, defender of their Pelasgian name, the leader who has been invincible in battle, has been cremated. Vulcan, the same god who armed him, has consumed him in the flames.² Now he is ashes, and little remains of the great Achilles, hardly enough to fill a funeral urn. But his fame lives on and fills the entire world. The tributes match the man himself. And with this glory the son of Peleus remains as mighty as in earlier days and does not feel the empty spaces of deep Tartarus.

One can tell how glorious Achilles was by how those warriors fought for his shield. They took up arms to battle for his arms. But Diomedes, son of Tydeus, did not dare to claim them, nor did Ajax, Oïleus’s son, or Menelaus, younger son of Atreus, or his brother, the greater warrior Agamemnon, or any of the others. Only Ajax, son of Telamon, and Laërtes’ son, Ulysses, had the boldness to assert that they deserved the glory of those arms. To avoid the burden and bad feeling involved in the decision, Agamemnon, blood relative of Tantalus, commanded the leaders of the Argives to sit down in the middle of the camp and shifted the decision in this quarrel to them all.

¹This is probably an allusion to Penthesilea, queen of the Amazons, who was killed by Achilles during the Trojan War. In some accounts, he fell in love with her as soon as he removed the helmet from her corpse. Other accounts say that he sexually violated the corpse.
²Vulcan had made special divine armour for Achilles.
Argive leaders sat down in their places, with common soldiers grouped around them, standing in a circle. Ajax strode up, lord of the seven-layered shield, a man with little patience, quick to grow enraged. With a fierce look he glanced out at the shore of Sigaeum and the ships up on the beach. He stretched his arm and said:

"Those ships there—we are making our case before those ships, and Ulysses stands here arguing with me! But he did not hesitate to back away from Hector’s flames, when I stood up to them and drove them from our fleet. And so for him, it’s safer to compete with crafty speeches than battle on with fists. I am not quick at using words, and he is slow to act. Just as I am powerful in battle and ferocious warfare, that man excels in talking. But I do not think I need to give you an account of my great deeds. You Greeks all saw them. Let Ulysses here tell us about his exploits, things he did when there were no witnesses, those actions..." which are known only to the night. The prize I seek is great—that I concede. But then, my rival here makes it less valuable. However great a thing may be, for Ajax there is no reason to take pride in it, if Ulysses seeks it, too. And in this contest that fellow has already got his prize, for when he is defeated, he can say he fought it out with me. As for myself, if you had any doubts about my courage, my noble birth is a strong argument. My father is Telamon, who captured the walls of Troy, led by brave Hercules, and reached the shores of Cochis in that ship from Pagasae. And my father’s father was Aeacus, who dispenses justice down there below, among the silent dead, where Sisyphus, the son of Aeolus, still pushes his huge stone. High Jupiter has acknowledged Aeacus, admitting he is his son, and therefore Ajax stands at three removes from Jupiter himself. And yet, you Greeks, do not let my descent speak for me in this quarrel, if those bonds are not shared by me and great Achilles. He was my cousin. What I am seeking is my cousin’s property. As for you, Ulysses, who in thieving and deceit are just like Sisyphus, your ancestor, why are you striving to involve the name of a foreign family in the affairs of those whose blood links them to Aeacus?

Or am I to be denied those weapons because I took up arms before he did, without being tricked by an informant? Or will he seem to be the better man because he was the last to take them up and, by pretending to be mad, refused to serve in war, until Palamedes,

---

1This is a reference to the Argonauts, who sailed with Jason in a ship made at Pagasae to Colchis to get back the Golden Fleece. For Ovid’s treatment of the story see 7.1 ff.

2Ajax’s father, Telamon, and Achilles’ father, Peleus, were brothers, both sons of Aeacus.
son of Nauplius, a shrewder warrior (though less alert about his own well being) exposed the plot his timid mind devised and dragged him to a war he had avoided. ¹
Is this man who declined to take up arms now to collect the finest arms of all?
Am I, who was the first to face the dangers,
to be dishonoured and denied those gifts from my own cousin?

How I wish his madness
had been real or we had believed it true and he had never come as our companion against the towers of Troy, this fellow who urges shameful acts on us. For then, we would not have stranded Philoctetes, Poeas’ son, on Lemnos, to our disgrace!²
Men say that now he hides in forest caves, shifts stones with his laments, and keeps praying Laërtes’ son will get what he deserves.
If there are gods, he does not pray in vain.
So now, alas, a man who swore an oath—
the same one we did—to join the conflict, one of our leaders, heir to those arrows left by Hercules, is broken by disease and hunger, fed and clothed by flying birds, and uses arrows Fate reserved for Troy to shoot at fowl. But still, he is not dead, for he sailed no further with Ulysses.
Wretched Palamedes would have chosen to be left there (he would still be alive or at least have died without being called a criminal). That fellow there remembered, all too vividly, how Palamedes had exposed his so-called fits of madness and charged him with betraying the Grecian cause,

¹The Greek leaders had made a promise to the father of Helen, that they would help the man she married. Menelaus married Helen and, when Paris abducted her, called upon the Greeks to honour their promise. Ulysses tried to avoid going to war by pretending to be mad. The warrior Palamedes exposed Ulysses’s trick, and so he was forced to join the expedition.

²Philoctetes had been bitten by a snake, and his cries of pain and the smell of his wound caused so much trouble in the army, that he was abandoned, en route to Troy, on the island of Lemnos. Philoctetes, as we learn a few lines further on, owned the bow of Hercules, which was needed to capture Troy. For Philoctetes’s role in Hercules’s cremation, see above 9.373.
something he just made up. He offered proof by finding gold he had earlier concealed.¹
So by abandonment or death, he saps the strength of Greeks. It is Ulysses’ way, and that is why he should be feared.

And even if he was more eloquent than faithful Nestor, I still would not believe that when he left, abandoning Nestor in that battle, he did nothing wrong.² Nestor was worn out, and old, and hampered by his horse’s wound, but when he asked Ulysses for his help, his comrade moved away. Diomedes, the son of Tydeus, knows very well I have not made these accusations up. He often shouted out Ulysses’ name and rebuked his craven friend, charging him with running away. Gods above look down, with their just eyes, on what we humans do! For, behold, the man who had refused his help required help. He had abandoned Nestor, and now he was to be abandoned, too. The precedent the man himself had set was now applied to him. He shouted out, calling to his companions. I ran up. I saw him trembling, pale with fear, afraid his death was close at hand. I set my shield so its enormous size would cover him, as he lay there, and saved his rotten life (small reason to get any praise for that!). If you prolong this contest, why not return to that location, bring back the enemy, the wound you had, and your usual fear, then crouch behind my shield, and under it battle it out with me! Once I’d saved him, the wounded man who did not have the strength to stand erect just scurried off—no wound ¹Ulysses forged a letter from king Priam of Troy to Palamedes offering gold for his treasonous services, allowed the letter to be discovered, and bribed Palamedes’ servants to hide gold in his camp. Palamedes was stoned to death.

²The reference here is to a battle in which Nestor is left exposed and needs help. Odysseus does not respond to a shout from Diomedes to help Nestor (in Homer it is clear that Odysseus does not hear the shout, not that he has heard and refuses to respond).
prevented him from running at top speed. Hector then moved up, bringing gods with him towards the battle. Wherever he charged, even brave men were afraid, not just you, Ulysses. That’s how much he terrorized our ranks. But I picked up a massive rock, hurled it from far away, and laid him out, while he was gloating over his success in bloody slaughter. When he challenged us to have one man confront him, I was the one who fought against him, and you men, you Greeks, prayed my lot would be the one selected. Your prayers were answered. And if you ask how that fight turned out, he did not prevail against me.

Then, look, Trojans are advancing, with fire and sword and Jupiter, as well, against Danaan ships. Where is he now, the eloquent Ulysses? The truth is this—I was the one who with this heart of mine saved a thousand ships, our hope of getting home. In return for that whole fleet, grant me these arms. But if you’ll now allow me to speak candidly, those weapons of Achilles are seeking out a greater honour than I am—they wish to be united to my glory. Those arms are seeking Ajax, not Ajax the arms. Let that Ithacan Ulysses compare what I have done with slaughtering Rhesus and that coward Dolon, or capturing a son of Priam, Helenus, or stealing the image of Minerva. None of these was done in daylight, and in none of them was Diomedes absent. If you award 1Hector issued a challenge to the Greeks to produce a warrior who would fight him in single combat. A few men volunteered (including Ajax) and the candidate was chosen by a lottery in which each man put a marker in a helmet. The helmet was shaken, and the first lot which fell out determined who would fight Hector. Ajax’s token was the first shaken out. The single combat was ended by the heralds of both armies without a clear winner.

---

2Rhesus, a Trojan ally, was slaughtered by Diomedes and Ulysses at night while he and his men were asleep. The two Greek also killed Dolon, a spy they captured and questioned. Helenus, a Trojan prince, was captured by the same two men. Ulysses also stole the statue of Minerva, the Palladium, inside Troy, on which the security of the city depended (as he mentions in his response to Ajax).
these weapons for such trifling services, divide them up and give the greater share to Diomedes. But why offer them to that man from Ithaca, who always acts in secret and unarmed and with his tricks deceives an unsuspecting enemy?
The way that helmet made of gleaming gold shines out so brilliantly will only show where he is hiding and reveal his plans.
What’s more, that Dulichian head of his,
once he puts on the helmet of Achilles, will not hold up so great a weight.¹ His arms,
which are not made for war, will find that spear
from Pelion too cumbersome and heavy.
As for the shield embossed with those designs of the vast universe, how will that suit
the left arm of a coward, born to steal?
Why then, you craven fool, seek out a gift which will just drain your strength? And if the Greeks give you Achilles’ weapons by mistake, that will not make your enemies afraid.
They will have a fine excuse to strip you.
Besides, running in flight, the only race where you surpass all others, you timid wretch, will be much slower, if you drag with you so great a load. Then, too, that shield of yours, which has been used so rarely in a fight, is still unharmed. Mine has a thousand cracks from stopping spears, and I need a new one.
But what’s the point of talking? Let’s end this by having people look at us in action!
Why not set those arms of brave Achilles right in the centre of the Trojan ranks, then order them to be retrieved from there.
You can adorn the man who brings them back with what he has recovered.”

Ajax finished.
After his last words, the common soldiers murmured among themselves, until Ulysses, Laërtes’ warrior son, rose to his feet.
He paused a moment, gazing at the ground.

¹Dulichium was part of Ulysses’ kingdom.
Then he raised his eyes, looked at the leaders, and opened up his mouth to start the speech they were expecting. His style was graceful and not ineloquent:

“If my wishes, along with yours, you Greeks, had any force, we would not be having this great debate about the doubtful question of an heir, for then Achilles would have his weapons, and we would still have him. But unjust Fate has taken him from you and me.”

And here Ulysses dabbed his eyes, as if he wished to wipe away a tear.

“What leader is more suited to succeed the great Achilles than the one we have to thank for making sure that mighty warrior joined up with us. Now, you must not denigrate my rival, because he seems so blunt, for he is dull. And do not let it hurt my argument that my shrewd mind has always helped you Greeks. As for my eloquence, if that is there, let no man feel upset, for now it pleads its master’s case—it has often spoken out on your behalf—and no man should refuse to use the talents he himself possesses.

Now, as to race and ancestry, those things we did not do ourselves, it’s hard to call such matters ours. But since Ajax has claimed he is a great-grandson of Jupiter, I say my family blood begins with Jove, and I am just as many steps removed. Laërtes is my father, his father was Arcesius, a son of Jupiter, neither of them guilty of a crime or condemned to exile.¹ Through my mother, ¹This is a reference to the killing of Phocus, a brother of Peleus and Telamon, for which both Peleus and Telamon were considered guilty and exiled.

I can also link myself to Mercury, another noble line.¹ For I have gods in both my parents’ ancestries. But still, I am not here asking for these weapons set out before us, because my mother gives me, on her side, a more splendid birth, or because my father is quite guiltless of his brother’s blood. You must judge this case by our own merits—provided Ajax gets no credit just because his father, Telamon, and Peleus were brothers. In dealing with such arms, you should consider, not bloodlines, but respect for virtuous deeds. For if what matters is the nearest kin and closest heir, Peleus is his father, Pyrrhus is his son. What claim has Ajax? Let Achilles’ arms be taken away to Phthia or to Scyros.² And Teucer is just as much a cousin of Achilles as Ajax is.³ But does he seek these arms? And if he did, would you offer them to him? So, since this contest is one of actions, and nothing else, I say that I have done more than I can easily describe in words, but still, I will set them out in order.

Achilles’ nereïd mother Thetis was aware her son was going to die. So she concealed her child and dressed him up in women’s clothes. The use of this disguise deceived each one of us, including Ajax.⁴ So among a few things women like to buy I placed some weapons which would stir the heart in any man, and when warlike Achilles,

---

¹Ulysses’ mother, Anticleia, was the daughter of Autolycus, whose father was Mercury. For the conception of Autolycus, see above 11.478 ff.
²Achilles’s father, Peleus, lived in Phthia, in Thessaly. Achilles’s son, Pyrrhus, was living in Scyros, one of the Cyclades islands, where Achilles had been sent to hide, so that he would not have to go to Troy.
³Teucer was Ajax’s half-brother. They had a common father, Telamon, but different mothers.
⁴Achilles mother, Thetis, did not want Achilles to join the army going to Troy, so she hid him on Scyros and dressed him up as a girl. The people being deceived are the Greek leaders travelling around to muster warriors for the expedition.
who had not yet thrown off his female clothes, reached for the spear and shield, I shouted out:

‘Son of a goddess, that doomed citadel, the Pergamum, is waiting there for you! Why hesitate to throw down mighty Troy?’

I took him in hand. I sent that brave man out to do brave deeds. And so his exploits are my own. It was my spear that wounded warlike Telephus and, once I’d conquered him, as he was praying for help, I healed him.¹ The fall of Thebes was my accomplishment, and give me credit for seizing Lesbos, and for Tenedos, Chrysa, and Cylla, Apollo’s cities, and for Scyros, too.² Think of me as the warrior whose hand knocked down Lynnessus and its city walls and razed them to the ground. I will not list all Achilles’ conquests, but there’s no doubt I am the one who brought to you the man who could kill savage Hector. Thanks to me, splendid Hector now lies dead! My weapons found Achilles, and in return for those I seek his weapons now.³ I gave him arms when he was still alive. Now he is dead, I want them back.

When Menelaus’ grief had spread to all the Greeks, a thousand ships near Euboea filled the bay at Aulis.⁴ But the winds blew from the wrong direction, or else there was no wind, and so the fleet for a long time simply waited. But then, according to a brutal oracle, ¹Telephus, a son of Hercules, was wounded by Achilles’s spear and then cured by the rust on the tip. For an earlier reference to this story see 12.173.

²Tenedos was an island close to Troy. Chrysa, Cylla, and Scyros were also cities in the vicinity of Troy (the island Scyros, where Achilles was hidden, was a different place). The Thebes mentioned was a city in Asia Minor, not the Thebes in Boeotia.
³Ulysses’s first reference to weapons here is to those he used to identify Achilles in Scyros. The second is to Achilles’s divine weapons made by Vulcan (the object of their debate).
⁴Aulis was a port in Boeotia, Euboea an island facing the port across the bay. The Greek fleet assembled here before sailing to Troy.
king Agamemnon had to sacrifice his innocent child to cruel Diana.
But he refused to carry out this act
and even grew angry at the gods themselves.
Although a king, he was a father, too.
I used my skill with words to change his mind,
to shift the affections of a parent towards the public good. The case I made was difficult, and the judge was biased.
That I concede (and, as I confess to this,
may the son of Atreus forgive me).¹
But the popular good, his brother's cause, and his regal responsibilities
at last convinced the king that claims of blood weighed less than public glory. So I was sent to Clytaemnestra, the young girl's mother, not to persuade her by some argument,
but to use a trick and get her to agree [that Iphigeneia should come to Aulis.]²
If Ajax had gone there instead of me,
our sails would still remain without a wind.

Then I was sent as an ambassador to the Trojan citadel, where I saw and boldly entered the assembly room of lofty Troy, still full of warrior men.
I did not flinch but argued for our cause,
as Greece had asked me. I accused Paris, demanded the Trojans give back Helen,
as well as all the property he seized,
and I won the sympathy of Priam and Antenor, too, Priam's counsellor.
But Paris and his brothers and those men under his command who took the plunder could hardly keep their wicked hands off me.
Menelaus, you know this, for that day was the first time you and I faced danger side by side.

¹The son of Atreus is Agamemnon, leader of the Greek army.
²Agamemnon needed Clytaemnestra to agree to let their daughter, Iphigeneia, come to Aulis. Ulysses told the queen that Iphigeneia was to go in order to be married to Achilles. I have added line 322 in the English to clarify what Clytaemnestra was agreeing to (there is no suggestion that she agreed to the sacrifice).
It would be tedious to describe the useful things I’ve done with stratagems and force during the course of this long war. After those first fights, the hostile Trojans for a long time stayed inside their city walls, giving us no chance for open conflict. But finally, in the tenth year, we fought. And in that time, Ajax, what did you do, when the only thing you know is fighting? What use were you? By contrast, if you ask what I did then, I was setting ambushes to kill our enemies, digging ditches by our defensive wall, encouraging my companions, so they could tolerate the tedium of protracted warfare with patient hearts, and handing out advice on how the soldiers could be fed and armed. And I was sent wherever I was needed.

Then, lo and behold, king Agamemnon, deceived while he was sleeping with a dream sent to him by command of Jupiter, ordered us to abandon our concerns about the war we had begun [and leave—to get back in our ships and sail for home.]

He justified his orders by appealing to his dream from Jupiter. But Ajax should have stopped him. He should have demanded the destruction of the Trojan citadel and fought back—the one thing he is good at! Why did he not try to stop the soldiers who were rushing to go home? And why not pick up his weapons, set an example which that fickle crowd of men could follow? This was not too much to ask from someone who never speaks except to boast aloud. But what about the fact that he, too, fled? Yes, I saw you. The sight made me ashamed, when you turned tail and started to prepare the sails of our disgrace. I did not wait but shouted at you:

---

1The Greeks erected some fortifications to defend their ships drawn up on the beach.

2I have added a line in the English to clarify Agamemnon’s order to his troops.
'What are you doing?
What mad fit, my friends, is pressuring you to run from captured Troy? After ten years, what will you carry home except your shame?'

Grief made me eloquent. With words like these and others I brought those stampeding men back from the fleet. The son of Atreus summoned an assembly of his allies, all still in a panic, and, even then,
Ajax, a son of Telamon, did not dare to utter a word. And yet Thersites got up the courage to insult the king (I beat him for his vulgar insolence). ¹
I stood and urged my frightened countrymen to fight our enemies, and with my voice
I gave them back the courage they had lost.
So from that point on, whatever brave things you saw that fellow over there achieve are thanks to me, because I was the one who dragged him back when he was running home.

Besides, who among the Greeks praises you,
Ajax, or seeks your company? In my case,
Diomedes shares all he does with me.
He backs me up and has always trusted
Ulysses as a comrade. That is something!
To be picked out of so many thousand Greeks by Diomedes! I was not compelled into a fight by any lottery, and yet, disregarding all the dangers of the enemy and the night, I went out and slaughtered Dolon, a Phrygian scout, whose mission was the very same as ours,
but not before I forced him to reveal all the things he knew. That’s how I found out the plans of the perfidious Trojans.
Once I’d discovered those, there was no need to keep on looking. I could have come back to enjoy the promised glory. But no, not content with that, I searched out the place

¹Thersites, a common soldier, was, according to Homer, the ugliest man in the Greek army. He was well known for his scathing insults.
where Rhesus pitched his tents and killed him there, in his own camp, as well as his companions. Once I had achieved what I was after, I rode back in a chariot I captured, like the victor in a joyous triumph. Dolon demanded Achilles’ horses for one night’s work, so if you deny me Achilles’ weapons, then Ajax may well be more generous than you.1

Why should I list those men Sarpedon led from Lycia cut down by my sword?2 In all that bloodshed, I killed Coeranus, son of Iphitus, Alastor and Chromius, Alcandor, Halius, Noëmon, and Prytanis. I brought death to Thoön, Chersidamas, Charops, and Ennomos (who was urged on by dreadful Fate). Some others less well known fell at my hand below their city walls. I have wounds, my friends, honourable ones, as their location shows.3 Do not believe mere empty words. Look!”

And here his hand pulled aside his clothing.

“Here is my chest which has always worked to serve your interests!4 But the son of Telamon has lost no blood, in all those many years, for his companions. His body has no wounds!4

And so what if he claims he used his weapons to fight the Trojans and Jupiter, as well, before our ships? I admit he did, for I do not wish 1Dolon had agreed to scout out the Greek position at night in return for the gift of Achilles’s horses once the Trojans defeated the Greeks. Lines 416-7 may be referring to Ajax’s notion that, if he doesn’t get the weapons, they should be divided between Ulysses and Diomedes.

2Sarpedon was a major ally of the Trojans. Lycia is in Asia Minor.

3An honourable wound is one received in the front, as one is facing the enemy.

4According to some traditions, the lion skin Ajax wore made him invulnerable.
to be mean-spirited and criticize any beneficial deeds. But Ajax should not get sole credit for those actions where others played their part. He should give you some of the honour, too. For Patroclus, from Actor’s line, who was well protected because he was the image of Achilles, drove back the Trojans from the Grecian ships which were about to be consumed by fire, along with Ajax, their defender.¹ He thinks he was the only one who dared confront the warlike Hector armed. But he forgets the king, the other leaders, and myself. He was the ninth to say he’d fight the man, and he was picked by chance. But then, most valiant warrior, how did that fight turn out? Hector walked away uninjured, without a single wound!

And now, alas, it grieves me to bring back a memory so full of sorrow—the day Achilles, the bulwark of the Greeks, was killed. And yet, no tears, or pain, or fear prevented me from picking up his body off the ground. And on these shoulders, these shoulders of mine, I carried the body of Achilles and his armour, too, the very weapons I’m anxious now to carry once again.² I have strength enough for such a burden, and I have a mind which, you may be sure, will understand the honour you have done me. Was it really for this the sea nymph Thetis, Achilles mother, was so determined to help her son she brought down from heaven works of such great artistry, so that Ajax, a crude soldier with no intelligence could wear them? For he does not understand ¹Achilles had quarreled with Agamemnon and withdrawn from the fighting. When Hector fired the first ship, Achilles sent Patroclus into battle dressed in Achilles’s very distinctive armour. The Trojans thought Achilles was returning to battle and were terrified.

²In Homer’s Iliad, recovering the corpse of a fallen comrade and his armour was considered an act of the greatest bravery. It conferred a very high status on the warrior who did it.
what is sculpted on the shield—Ocean, Earth, high star-filled skies, the Pleiades, Hyades, the Bear that never moves down to the sea, the different cities, Orion’s gleaming sword. He is asking you to give him weapons [whose meaning Ajax does not even grasp?]

And what about how he accuses me of running from the duties of harsh war and coming late into an enterprise which others had begun? Does he not see he is denouncing great Achilles, too? If you consider it a crime to hide who one really is, both of us did that. And if delaying makes me culpable, I did join up before Achilles did. My dear wife detained me—with Achilles it was his loving mother. We gave them those early days. The rest we gave to you. If I have no defence against that point, I do not fear a charge which I would share with that heroic man, who was revealed thanks to Ulysses’ skill. Ajax played no role in finding out Ulysses.

None of us should be astonished that his foolish tongue pours insults over me, for he complains about you, too, and ought to be ashamed. Was it so wrong for me to falsely charge the son of Nauplius, yet fine for you to sentence him to death? Palamedes could not defend himself against a crime that was so great and clearly evident. You not only heard what he was charged with—you saw his crimes exposed, proved by that bribe!

And I do not deserve to be accused if Lemnos, Vulcan’s island, is still home to Philoctetes, the son of Poeas

---

1Patroclus was killed wearing the armour of Achilles, which Hector removed. Thetis replaced that armour with divine armour made by Vulcan, god of the forge. Vulcan decorated Achilles’s shield with wonderfully comprehensive symbols of the entire warrior universe. Line 295 has been rejected as spurious by some editors.
(since you yourselves agreed to leave him there, defend what you have done). I won’t deny I did convince him to withdraw from war and hardships of our journey and to try easing his agonizing pain by resting. He agreed—and is alive! My advice not only was provided in good faith (and my good faith alone would have sufficed)—it also proved effective. Now our seers all say that Poeas’ son must be with us for Troy to be destroyed. Do not send me! It would be better if Ajax made the trip and with his eloquence calmed down that man driven mad with rage and sickness, or else came up with a sly trick to bring him back! If my mind ever stopped its work for you, the stream in Simois would reverse its flow, and Ida’s mountain stand there stripped of leaves, and Achaeans promise help to Trojans, before the brain in dim-witted Ajax came up with something useful to the Greeks. And though you, unyielding Philoctetes, are angry at your friends, the king, and me, and though you never cease pouring curses on my head and, in excruciating pain, long for a chance to have me in your power and drain my blood—to have your way with me, as I did then with you—I will still go and try to bring you back with me. What’s more, with Fortune’s help, I’ll also get your arrows, just as I brought back that Trojan prophet, Helenus, whom I captured, and made known what gods had said about the fate of Troy, just as I stole that statue from the shrine of Phrygian Minerva, surrounded by my enemies. And will Ajax now compare himself with me? We know the Fates decreed Troy never would be overcome unless we had that statue. Where was he,
the valiant Ajax? Where were the proud boasts of that great man? What made him fearful then? Why did Ulysses dare move through the sentries, commit himself to darkness of the night, and sneak past the sharp swords of the Trojans, to make his way inside, not just the city walls, but even their high citadel, as well, to snatch the goddess from her temple shrine, and, once I had her, bear her back again through enemy lines? If I’d not done that, the left arm of Ajax would bear his shield—all seven layers of bull’s hide—in vain. On that night I ensured our victory against the Trojans. On that very night I conquered their citadels, for my theft made such a conquest possible.

Ajax, you can stop your muttering and those looks, those attempts to bring up Diomedes. That deed has earned him his full share of praise! When you held up your shield before the ships, you were not alone. You had comrades there, a crowd of them. But I had only one. If he did not know that a man who fights is of less value than a man who thinks and that this prize should not be handed out merely to a fearless, strong right hand, he, too, might claim Achilles’s weapons. And lesser Ajax, a more modest man, would also claim them, and fierce Eurypylus, and Thoas, illustrious Andraemon’s son. Meriones would surely make a claim, as would his fellow countryman from Crete Idomeneus, and so would Menelaus, Agamemnon’s brother. All these leaders have powerful hands and are my equals on the battlefield, and yet they follow my advice. Your right hand gives useful help in combat, Ajax, but it needs guidance from my ingenuity. You have strength, but no intelligence, while I consider what the future holds. You can fight in war, but the son of Atreus and I select... the proper time for battle. While you serve only with your body, I use my mind.
The man who steers a ship is valued more than the man who rows, and the army chief is far above the soldier in the ranks.
In just that way—and to the same extent—I am worth more than you. In my body the mind has greater power than the hands, for all my energies are focused there.

So now, you warrior chiefs, award those arms to the man who has stayed on watch for you, for all those years I spent with anxious cares. Grant me this honour as compensation for all my service. Now my work is done.

I have removed the barriers of Fate, for I have made it possible to take high Pergamum, and thus have captured it. So by our common hopes, by Troy’s doomed walls, by the gods I snatched away so recently from Troy, and by whatever still remains which needs a clever mind to carry out, I pray that if there is anything bold and dangerous still left to undertake, [if you think, in dealing with Troy’s fate, we still have things to do], remember me! And if you do not grant these arms to me, give them to her!"

With these words, he pointed to the fatal statue of Minerva.

Ulysses’ words swayed the group of leaders—the outcome showed what eloquence can do. The fluent speaker took the brave man’s arms, and Ajax, who fought Hector man to man, who stood so often against sword and fire and even Jupiter, for the first time met an enemy he could not repulse—his rage. Pulling out his sword, he shouted:

AJAX KILLS HIMSELF

Some editors and translators have rejected the words in square brackets.
“At least this sword is mine! Or does Ulysses want this for himself, as well? I must use it on myself, and this sword, so often steeped in Trojan blood will now drip with its master’s. And thus no man could ever conquer Ajax except Ajax himself.”

He spoke these words, then drove his sword into his exposed flesh, deep inside his chest, which until that time had never felt a wound. His hand lacked strength to pull the sword back out, but by itself his blood expelled the steel. On the green turf the bloodstained ground produced the purple flower which earlier had grown out of the wound of Hyacinthus, the bloom whose petals in the middle bear those letters common to the Spartan lad and to the hero—a young man’s cry of grief, a warrior’s name.

Victorious Ulysses then set sail for Lemnos, land of Hypsipyle and famous Thoas. Long ago the place had been notorious, for all women there had killed their husbands. He was going to collect those arrows, weapons which had once belonged to Hercules. And when he brought them and Philoctetes, their owner, back to the Greeks, then, at last, the final acts of that long war took place. [Troy and Priam fell, and the wife of Priam, poor Hecuba, when everything was gone, lost her human form, and in a foreign place,

---

1 According to some traditions, the lion’s skin Ajax wore (which came from Hercules) made him invulnerable, except in one place, the hole where Hercules’s arrow had gone in when he killed the lion. Hence, Ajax’s flesh was “exposed” there.

2 The letters on the flower, the hyacinth, were ai ai, put there by Apollo to indicate his grief over the death of Hyacinthus (for Ovid’s treatment of the story, see 10.294 ff. above). The letters are also a close approximation to Ajax’s name in Greek (Aias).

3 The women of Lesbos had offended Venus, who then, as punishment, gave them all a nasty smell. When their husbands turned to other women, the wives murdered them. Hypsipyle had saved her father, Thoas, from this slaughter.
where the long Hellespont forms a narrow strait, she fills the air with barking.)¹

Troy was on fire,
and the flames had not yet been extinguished.
Jupiter’s altar was still soaking up the meagre streams of ancient Priam’s blood.
Apollo’s priestess, hauled out by the hair, was holding up her arms in a vain plea to heaven, and the victorious Greeks were dragging away the women of Troy, an enviable prize, as the women,
while they still could, kept gathering in crowds inside the burning temples, still clutching their paternal gods. Infant Astyanax was hurled down to his death from those same towers where he often watched his father Hector.² Andromache, his mother, would point him out
as he was fighting on his child’s behalf, protecting his ancestral realm.

And now,
North Wind was urging Greeks to leave for home,
the sails were flapping in a friendly breeze,
and sailors said they had to take advantage of the winds. The women of Troy all cried:

“Farewell, Troy. We are being taken away.”

They kissed the Trojan ground and left behind their smoking homes. The last one to embark—a wretched sight!—was Hecuba. They found her surrounded by the tombs which held her sons, clinging to their graves and trying to kiss her children’s bones. Ulysses dragged her off.
But she opened up one grave and carried Hector’s ashes with her, clutched to her breast, leaving a lock of hair on Hector’s stone,
a humble offering, her gray hair and tears.

¹Some editors and translators consider these lines spurious. Hecuba’s story is told later in this book.
²The priestess was Cassandra, a daughter of Priam. Priam was killed by Achilles’s son, Pyrrhus (also called Neoptolemus), at the altar in the temple of Zeus, where he had taken sanctuary. According to tradition, Ulysses took Hector’s baby child Astyanax from his mother and threw him over the walls of Troy.
Now, facing Phrygia and Trojan land, there was a country where Bistonians lived and Polymestor had a lavish palace.

Your father, Polydorus, sent you to him to be brought up in secret, a long way from the war going on in Troy. A wise plan, if your father, Priam, had not sent you with such wealth—a tempting prize, rich enough to turn an avaricious man to crime. So when the fortunes of the Trojans fell, the wicked Thracian king picked up a sword and drove it into Polydorus’ throat—into his foster child!—and after that, as if he could get rid of his own crime by throwing out the corpse, he climbed a rock and hurled the lifeless body in the sea.

Agamemnon, son of Atreus, moored his fleet on a beach in Thrace, waiting for calm seas and more favourable winds. Suddenly the ground split open, making a wide cleft, and Achilles’ ghost emerged, as massive as he used to be in life. His face looked threatening, like the expression he wore the day he pulled his sword on Agamemnon in that fierce and lawless confrontation. He called out:

“So, you Greeks, you’re leaving. You have forgotten me. Your gratitude for my courageous acts you buried with me! Do not let that happen! My funeral mound must not lack its honours. So to appease Achilles’ shade, you Greeks must sacrifice Polyxena, Priam’s child.”

---

1Bistonians were a people in Thrace, north of the Hellespont.
2This is a reference to the famous quarrel between Achilles and Agamemnon over captured spoils (the opening scene of the Iliad), which led to Achilles’s withdrawal from the fighting.
3Polyxena was the youngest daughter of Priam and Hecuba. In some accounts, she had been captured and befriended by Achilles, who told her about the one vulnerable spot on his body (his heel). Achilles was killed by a poisoned arrow from Paris. It hit him in the heel in an ambush, when he was on his way to meet Polyxena.
His comrades obeyed the orders of that ruthless ghost. Despite the comfort Hecuba still had, they tore Polyxena from her mother’s arms and led the young girl to Achilles’ burial site. She was strong, in spite of her misfortune, and kept up her courage, more than most women do. But she became a victim, sacrificed to a pitiless grave. As she stood there, before the savage altar and witnessed the harsh rites they were preparing for her, she remembered she was Priam’s daughter. When she saw Achilles’ son standing by, gripping a sword, and staring at her face, she said:

“Now shed this noble blood. You have no need to wait. So plunge that sword of yours deep in my throat or chest.”

Here she exposed her neck and breast.

“You may be sure of this—Polyxena has no wish to be a slave to any man, and this kind of ritual will not appease the gods. I only wish my mother would not hear about my death. She worries me, diminishing my joy in dying. And yet she should be mourning, not my death, but her own life. Move off, you men, so I may go to Stygian shades in freedom, and if my prayer is just, let no man set his hand on virgin flesh. Whoever you are trying to appease by killing me will be more satisfied with blood from someone free. If my last words move any of you—and I am no slave requesting this, but king Priam’s daughter—return my body with no ransom paid back to my mother. For the mournful right to have a tomb, let her pay, not with gold, but with her tears. Back in earlier days, when she still could, she used to pay in gold.”

Polyxena finished. She shed no tears. The people did that for her. Even the priest wept as he reluctantly plunged in the knife and pierced the breast she offered up to him. As her knees buckled, she fell to the ground, but to the very end her face remained quite fearless, and even as she collapsed, she took great care to hide those parts of her that should remain concealed and so maintained the honour of her blameless modesty.

The Trojan women took up the body, counting all the names of Priam’s children they had mourned and all the bloody killings this one house had suffered. They grieved for you, young virgin girl, and you, too, Hecuba. Not long ago they called you a king’s wife and royal parent, the very image of rich Asia, and now a worthless part of captured spoils. Victorious Ulysses would have refused to take you as his slave, had you not given birth to noble Hector, who had great trouble finding anyone who wished to be his mother’s master.

Hecuba embraced her daughter’s body, whose spirit, which had been so brave, was gone. She shed tears over it, the very tears she had so often wept for her own land, her children, and her husband, pouring them into the young girl’s wound. She kissed her lips, beat her chest, as she had done so frequently, and trailed her gray hair in congealing blood. She tore her breasts and cried out many things, including this:

“O my child, you are your mother’s final grief. What else is left? My daughter lying here! I see your wound as my own injury. Look here! This wound was to make sure I did not lose one child without some blood being spilled. Still, I thought you, as a woman, would be spared the steel.
But now, even though you were a woman,
you have fallen to the sword. That same man who slaughtered so many of your brothers has killed you, too—Achilles, who ruined Troy and left me childless. After that man fell to those arrows of Paris and Apollo,
I said:

‘Now, at least, we no longer need to fear Achilles.’

But even in death,
I should have feared him. His very ashes in his tomb rage against our royal house.
Even from the grave we have felt his hate.
It was for Achilles that I gave birth to all my children. And now mighty Troy has fallen. The destruction of our state has reached its bitter end. Still, it’s over.
For me alone Troy’s citadel yet stands.
My grief will run its course. Not long ago,
I was the greatest lady of them all,
thanks to my husband, my many children,
all those sons-in-law and daughters-in-law.
Now I am helpless, dragged into exile, torn from my family’s burial mounds,
a gift for Ulysses’ wife, Penelope, who will point me out to married women in Ithaca, as I am spinning wool
she hands to me, and say:

‘This woman here
is Hector’s famous mother, Priam’s queen.’

After I had lost so many children, you, Polyxena, were the only one who would alleviate a mother’s grief.
And now you have been made a sacrifice at an enemy grave! I bore children as sacrificial offerings for my foes!
And yet, like iron, I endure. But why?
Why am I still here? Why am I preserved by lingering old age. You cruel gods, why prolong the life of an old woman who has lived so long, unless your purpose is to have me witness still more funerals? Who could have imagined Priam happy once Pergamum fell? But he is happy in his death! He did not see you butchered, my child, for he left his life and kingdom both at the same time. I assumed that you, a royal child, would have rich burial rites, your body placed in our ancestral tombs. But that is not the fortune of this house. Your funeral gifts will be a mother’s tears and a pile of foreign sand! We have lost everything. The only child remaining is Polydorus, once the youngest son of our family line, and now a reason for me to go on living for a while. We sent him to these shores, entrusting him to Polymestor’s care, a Thracian king. But why waste all my time with these laments? I should rinse your savage wound with water and wash away those dreadful spots of blood smeared across your face.”

Hecuba said this, and shuffled off, with an old woman’s gait, down to the sea shore, pulling her white hair. She cried:

“You Trojan women, fetch a jug!”

The poor woman wanted to draw water from the sea. But there by the shore she saw Polydorus’ body thrown up on the beach with gaping cuts from blades of Thracian swords. The Trojan women screamed, but Hecuba was dumb with grief. Pain had swallowed her voice and dried the tears drops welling in her eyes. She stood still, like impenetrable rock. At times she fixed her eyes down at the ground, or raised her haggard face up to the sky. Then she would look at her son lying there, at his face and wounds, but mainly at his wounds.
She felt her anger growing deep inside and made that rage her weapon. She caught fire, and, as if she were still queen, set her mind on vengeance, concentrating all her thoughts on how she could punish Polymestor. Just as a lioness rages at the theft of her unweaned cub and looks for footprints of an adversary she cannot see, so Hecuba, mixing her grief with rage, recalled her courage, cast her age aside, went to Polymestor, who had arranged the dreadful murder, and asked to see him. She said she wished to show him stores of gold she had buried away, so he could give it to her son. The Thracian king believed her, and, driven by his usual love of gain, came to her in private. He spoke to her with slyly reassuring words:

“Come now, Hecuba, do not wait. Give me that gift kept hidden for your son. He’ll get all of it—what you are giving now and gave before. I swear by the gods.”

She watched him grimly, as he uttered this deceitful promise, and then her simmering rage boiled over. Calling on her group of captive women to seize hold of Polymestor, she sank her fingers into his treasonous eyes and gouged his eyeballs out. Rage made her strong. She plunged her hands, stained with Polymestor’s blood, inside the holes and sucked out, not his eyes (for they were gone) but what was in the sockets.

The Thracian folk, angry at the murder of their king, started to attack the queen, hurling stones and weapons. But Hecuba chased after rocks they threw and snapped at them, growling harshly. And when she set her jaws and tried to speak, she barked. The place stills stands. It’s called Cynossema, the Bitch’s Tomb, a name derived from things that happened there.
For a long time Hecuba remembered the ancient evils she had undergone and still continued howling mournfully through all the fields of Thrace. Her suffering moved the Trojans and the enemy Greeks and all the gods, as well—yes, all of them—so even Juno, Jove’s wife and sister, affirmed that Hecuba had not deserved to end her life that way.

But Aurora,
though a supporter of the Trojan cause,
had no time to grieve at these disasters,
the fall of Troy and end of Hecuba.
She was troubled with a private sorrow,
a grief closer to home, her missing son, Memnon. His rose-coloured goddess mother had seen him slaughtered by Achilles’ spear on the Phrygian plains, and seeing that,
her rosy tint which dyes the morning light grew pale, and the sky was hidden in cloud.
When his body was placed above the fire,
his mother could not bear to witness it.
Casting her pride aside, she went to Jove
just as she was, with her hair dishevelled, fell down at his knees in tears, and said:

“I count for less than all divinities the golden aether holds (in the whole world my temples are the rarest of them all).
But I come here a goddess, not asking you to give me shrines or sacrificial days or altars hot with fires. Still, if you see how much this female goddess does for you, when with the light of each new dawn I check the limits of the night, you might well think I should get some reward. But Aurora is not concerned about these matters now and does not intend to seek those honours she deserves. My reason for being here is my son Memnon, who is gone from me.
He fought bravely for his uncle Priam, though in a losing cause, and, while still young, fell to great Achilles (so you willed it).\textsuperscript{1} O supreme ruler of the gods, I beg you—give him some honour, a consolation for his death, and relieve his mother’s pain.”

Jupiter nodded his consent. And then, as Memnon’s high funeral pyre collapsed in towering flames, columns of dark smoke stained the sky, just as a naiad breathes out thick river mists which do not let the Sun shine underneath them. The black ash flew up, merged to a single body, grew more dense,
took on a shape, and drew up life and heat from flames below. Its lightness gave it wings.
At first the form looked something like a bird,
then like a real bird with whirring wings.
Countless sister shapes, born from the same source, grew beating wings, as well. Three times this flock flew past the pyre, and three times they called out in unison. On the fourth flight, the birds split up into two different clusters, swooped fiercely in from opposite directions,
and launched a war, with raging claws and beaks,
until the fight wore out their wings and hearts,
and then, recalling they had been produced from such a valiant man, their bodies fell as sacrifices to the buried ashes of their kinsman. The one from whom these birds were born so suddenly gave them their name, for people call them the Memnonides or Memnon’s offspring. When the Sun has passed through his twelve signs, they fight and die again in a ritual tribute to their father.\textsuperscript{2} Thus, while it seemed to others very sad that Hecuba was barking like dog, Aurora was concerned with her own grief,
and even now she sheds her loving tears and scatters them as dew through all the world.

\textsuperscript{1}Memnon’s father was Tithonus, a brother of Priam. He had been granted immortality by Aurora, but not freedom from growing old. Memnon was a king in Ethiopia.

\textsuperscript{2}Memnon was worshipped as a god in Egypt, where there was a famous statue of him. This annual fight of the birds probably refers to a yearly ritual to commemorate the divine hero.
BOOK THIRTEEN

But Fates do not allow Troy’s future hopes to perish with its walls. For Aeneas, heroic son of Venus, carries off Troy’s sacred images on his shoulders and his father, too, Anchises, an old and sacred burden.¹ From all their riches, his family piety selects that prize, along with his young son, Ascanius. From Antandros the fleet of exiles sails across the sea, leaving far behind them the polluted homes of Thrace, that region still soaking in the blood of Polydorus.² With following winds and steady currents he and his group of allies come to Delos, Apollo’s city, where Anius rules, governing his people, and, as a priest, managing the rituals of Apollo. He receives Aeneas in the temple and in his home and shows him the city, the celebrated shrine, and the two trees Latona had once gripped while giving birth.³ The men put incense on the flames, pour wine onto the incense, slaughter oxen, and burn the entrails, following their rites. Then they move off to the royal palace, where lofty couches have been set for them. They eat the gifts of Ceres and drink wine. At that point virtuous Anchises says:

“Chosen priest of Phoebus, I may be wrong, but the first time I saw your city walls did you not have four daughters and a son, if my memory is correct?”

Anius shook his head, bound with fillets of white cloth around his temples, and answered sadly:

---

¹Aeneas, who was related to the royal family of Troy, was the leader of the Dardanians, allies of the Trojans and closely linked to them (Dardanus was the mythical founder of the Trojan royal family). Aeneas played an important role in the Trojan War.

²Antandros was a coastal city near Troy.

³For the birth of Apollo and Diana on Delos, see above 6.315.
“Greatest of heroes, you are not mistaken. You saw me the father of five children, and now—given the way fickle fortune changes things for men—you are seeing me when I am almost childless. For what help is my absent son to me? He now lives and, in his father’s name, governs Andros, an island which derives its name from him. The Delian god, Apollo, gave him [650] prophetic powers, and to my daughters Bacchus gave other gifts, things well beyond what anyone might hope for or believe. For everything my daughters touched was changed to grain, or streams of wine, or grey-green olives. So these girls’ touch could serve to make one rich. When Agamemnon, ravager of Troy, discovered this, he dragged the girls by force out of their father’s arms and ordered them to use their heaven-sent gift to furnish the Argive fleet (for you should not assume we did not feel, at least to some degree, the destructive storm you faced). Well, those girls ran off, each one escaping where she could. Two reached Euboea, two went to Andros, where their brother ruled. Greek soldiers followed and threatened war unless he gave them up. Fear overcame his natural affection, and he handed over his own sisters. You can forgive their brother’s craven act. He had no Hector or Aeneas there to fight for Andros, those two warriors whose courage kept you fighting for ten years. But as the Greeks were going to chain them, those daughters raised their arms (which were still free) towards the heavens and cried:

‘Father Bacchus, bring us your aid!’

The god who gave their gift did offer help, if one can call it help to do away with them in some amazing way. For I could not tell how they lost their shape, nor can I tell you now. But I do know [670] [660] [670]
the end of this bad luck—those girls grew wings and were transformed, changed into snow-white birds, those doves whom Venus loves, your goddess wife.”

After they had feasted and passed the time with tales like this and other conversation, they left the table and retired to bed.
They rose at dawn and went off to consult the oracle of Phoebus and were told to seek their ancient mother, Italy, and their ancestral shores.¹ King Anius escorted them as they prepared to leave and offered gifts—a sceptre for Anchises,
a cloak and quiver for Ascanius, and a wine bowl for Aeneas, a gift Anius had been given earlier by Therses, a Boeotian guest of his,
who lived in Thebes. Therses had sent the bowl, but Alcon, a man who came from Hyle, was the artist who produced it. On the surface he had engraved images depicting a lengthy story. There was a city.
It was not named, but it had seven gates, each clearly visible. That detail showed the place was Thebes. Outside the city walls were scenes depicting mourning—burial rites, tombs, fiery funeral pyres, and women with flowing hair and naked breasts. One could see nymphs, as well, in tears, weeping for their springs which had dried up. A bare tree without leaves stood out, and goats were chewing on dry stones.
And look! In the middle of that city he has depicted Orion’s daughters, one slitting her bare throat (the sort of wound a woman does not give herself), and one plunging a sword in her courageous heart, each girl dying to protect her people, and their two bodies being taken off in a splendid funeral procession through the city and burned amid a crowd of mourners.² Then, from the virgin cinders,

¹According to old legends, Dardanus, the founder of the Trojan royal family, originally came from Italy.
²Orion’s daughters sacrificed themselves to save their city from a plague. Orion was a king of Thebes.
to make sure their family does not die,
two young men arise, now celebrated as the Coroni, and lead the funeral march that carries back their mothers’ ashes.
These were the brilliant pictures he engraved in the ancient bronze. On the wine bowl’s rim was a raised edge of gold acanthus leaves.
The Trojans offered gifts no less expensive—
for the priest a box to store his incense, a libation bowl, and a shining crown fashioned with gold and gemstones.

From Delos,
remembering that, as Trojans, their blood traced back its origin to Teucer’s line, they made their way to Crete, but did not stay.
They could not bear the climate of the place.¹
They left the island of a hundred cities, hoping to reach some Ausonian port in Italy.² But a fierce storm arose with threatening seas, and so for refuge they sailed into the treacherous harbour of the Strophades, and were terrorized by winged Aëllo, a harpy.³ From there they sailed past Dulichium’s harbour, past Same, the houses of Neritos, and the kingdom of devious Ulysses.⁴
They saw Ambracia, a land the gods ce once fought about, and the image in stone of the man who judged their quarrel. The place is famous now for Apollo’s shrine commemorating Actium.⁵ They passed

¹Teucer was the name of an early king of Troy. He had originally moved there from Crete (he is not to be confused with Teucer, the half-brother of Ajax, who is mentioned at line 13.257 above). The Trojans are sometimes called the Teucrians (see 13.1189 below). The “climate” of Crete drove them away because of drought and plague.

²Ausonia is a name for a region of southern Italy.

³A harpy was a flying animal with the face of young girl. The harpies had been chased to the Strophades by two of the Argonauts, Calais and Zethes (see above 7.6). The Strophades were islands in the Ionian Sea.

⁴Dulichium, Same, and Neritos were all part of Ulysses’s territories.

⁵Three gods (Apollo, Diana, and Hercules) fought over who would be the divine patron of Ambracia. They asked Cragaleus, a man famous for his wisdom, to judge the case. He was persuaded to give the prize to Hercules. Apollo, in anger, turned him to stone. The shrine of Apollo was built by Augustus to the land of Dodona which has those oaks which utter oracles, and the coastal shores of Chaonian land, where the royal sons of the Molossian king changed into birds and thus escaped a fire set by thieves.¹

After that, they headed to Phaeacia, a region with rich orchards, and from there sailed to Epirus and to Buthrotos, a city built like Troy, where Helenus, the Trojan prophet, ruled.² From him they learned what the future had in store, for Helenus, a son of Priam, told them everything he could predict through faithful prophecies. The Trojans then moved on to Sicily.

This island has three headlands pushing out into the sea. Of these three, Pachynus faces the rainy south, Lilybaeum confronts the soft west winds, and Peloros looks to the northern Bear who never dips into the sea.³ The Teucrians sailed here, and, with a helpful current, rowed the fleet until, as night was coming on, they reached the sandy shores of Zancle. To their right loomed Scylla, and on their left, Charybdis, a restless brute who gobbles down men’s ships and spits them out again. Scylla wears a belt of savage dogs around her dark-skinned gut. She has a young girl’s face and (if those tales the poets left are not all just made up) once long ago she was a virgin girl whom many suitors courted. But Scylla rejected all of them. She used to visit the ocean nymphs—she was their favourite—and tell them of young men whose love she spurned.

commemorate his victory at the Battle of Actium in 31 BC, where he decisively defeated Antony and Cleopatra and consolidated his position of political power in Rome.

¹Dodona in Epirus was the site of an important shrine to Jupiter. The oak trees there, so people claimed, played an important role in the oracular responses. The children of the Molossian king were changed into birds by Jupiter when thieves set their house on fire.

²The Phaeacians lived in Corcyra (Corfu).

³For Ovid’s account of why the constellation of the Bear does not sink below the level of the sea, see above 2.747 ff. (Juno’s request to Oceanus and Tethys).
Once when a sea nymph, Galatea, let Scylla comb her hair, Galatea said:

“At least the kind of men who seek you out, Scylla, are not brutal. You can reject them, as you do, without fear of getting hurt. But I, a daughter of Nereus, born to sea-green Doris, and protected, too, by a crowd of sisters, could not escape the love of the cyclops Polyphemus except through pain and sorrow.”

Here her tears choked her voice, preventing her from speaking. With her white fingers, Scylla wiped away the tears, calmed the goddess down, and said:

“Dearest Galatea, tell me. Do not hide why you are grieving. You can trust in me.”

The Nereid then replied to Scylla, daughter of Crataïs:

“Acis was the son of Faunus and Symaethis, a sea nymph, a great joy to his father and his mother, but even more to me, for he loved me and no one else.” He was a handsome lad, sixteen years old, with the first downy hair starting to grow out on his tender cheeks. I tried to spend every minute with him, and Polyphemus did the same with me. If you were to ask, I could not tell you which was stronger in me—love of Acis or hatred for that cyclops, for I felt strong passion either way. O Gentle Venus how powerful your rule is over us!

For that savage creature Polyphemus, whom the very forest fears and strangers cannot look upon without some danger, Crataïs was a river in southern Italy, Symaethis a river in Sicily. Faunus was a god of the woods, the Roman equivalent of the Greek god Pan. A cyclops was a giant monster with one eye in the middle of his forehead. Polyphemus is an important character in the Odyssey, who attacks and eats some of Odysseus’ men and who is blinded by Odysseus. However in this tale Polyphemus has not yet encountered Odysseus (Ulysses).

who scorns mighty Olympus and its gods, now has a sense of what love is and, seized by fervent passion, burns and quite forgets his flocks and caves. And then, Polyphemus, you start to worry about how you look and how to please. You comb your bristling hair with rakes and love to trim your shaggy beard with a pruning hook or gaze into a pond at your wild face and fix how you appear. Your love of slaughter and your cruelty, your monstrous thirst for blood—all that is gone. Ships come and go in safety.

In the meantime, Telemus reached Sicily. He was the son of Eurymus and had never been deceived by any omen. He went to Aetna, met the giant Polyphemus, and said:

‘That one eye in the middle of your forehead will be taken from you by Ulysses.’

Polyphemus laughed and said:

‘You are wrong, you stupidest of prophets. Someone else—a young girl—has already captured it.’

He spurned the warning. Though it was the truth, the prophecy was wasted. Polyphemus strode away with massive, heavy footsteps along the shore and, when he grew tired, went back to his dark cave.

A wedge-shaped hill ran a long way out to sea, with ocean waves lapping along both sides. The wild cyclops climbed the central ridge, sat down, and took out his shepherd’s pipe made of a hundred reeds. His woolly flocks, with no one left to tend them, came up, too. He laid a pine tree at his feet. It was his walking staff, but large enough to hold aloft the rigging on a ship. All the hillside heard his pastoral notes, as did the sea. I was there, too, hidden by a rock, lying in my Acis’ arms,
and from a distance heard the cyclops’ song.
What my ears picked up, my mind remembers.
It went something like this:

‘O Galatea,
whiter than leaves of snow-white columbine,
more flowery than meadows in full bloom,
more slender than a splendid alder tree,
more bright than glass, more lively than young goats,
more smooth than sea shells worn down by the waves,
more pleasing than the sun in winter time or shade in summer heat, more beautiful than apples, a more pleasing sight to see than lofty plane trees, more dazzling than ice, sweeter than ripe grapes, softer than swan down or curdled milk, and, if you do not run from me, much lovely than well-watered garden parks.

And yet, at the same time, Galatea,
you are wilder than young bulls not yet tamed,
harder than old oak, slyer than the sea,
tougher than willow twigs or branching vines,
more stubborn than these crags, more violent than raging streams, more vain than valued peacocks, more fierce than fire, more prickly than a thorn,
more vicious than a mother bear with cubs,
more hard of hearing than the ocean waves,
more ruthless than a stepped-on water snake,
and, what, above all, I would like to change,
you are not only swifter than a stag being followed by a pack of baying dogs, but you run faster even than the winds and the fleeting breeze.

But if you knew me well,
you would feel sorry you keep flying off
and curse yourself for holding back like this.
You’d make more effort to stay close to me.
For I live here, and on these mountain slopes
I have caves carved out of natural rock where you’ll not feel the cold when winter comes or the heat in summertime. And I have fruit-laden branches on my apple trees, and grapes which look like gold on tailing vines and purple ones. I save both kinds for you.
You hands will pluck delicious strawberries born in the shady woods, with autumn plums and cherries, too—not just the blue-black kind so full of juice, but full-grown yellow fruit, the colour of fresh wax. When you are mine, you will have berries from arbutus trees and chestnuts. All trees will be your slaves.
This whole flock is mine, and many others wandering the valleys, with many more hiding in the woods or penned up in caves.
If you should ask how many beasts there are
I could not tell you. It’s a poor man’s job to keep a tally of the flocks he owns.
And you don’t need to take my word for it when I praise them all. Your own eyes can see how they can hardly move those legs of theirs, their udders are so full. And there are lambs, the young ones of the flock, kept in warm folds,
and kids, the same age as the lambs, secure in other pens. I always have white milk—some I keep to drink and some to curdle.

You will have gifts, and not just common ones anyone can get, like deer or hares or goats or matching doves or young birds from the trees.
For I picked up a shaggy bear’s two cubs as pets for you to play with, so alike it’s hard to tell which one of them is which.
I saw them on the mountain top and said:

‘I’ll keep these for my mistress Galatea.’

Now, Galatea, just raise your shining head from the dark blue sea. Do not spurn my gifts, but come here now. You know, I saw myself not long ago by gazing at my image in clear water. And looking at my shape was a delight. Just see how big I am!
You like to talk about this Jupiter, whoever he is, who rules in heaven.
His body is no bigger than my own.
And lots of hair hangs down on my stern face and keeps my shoulders shaded from the sun, just like a grove of trees. You should not think this covering of dense and bristling hair is unattractive. A tree is ugly when it has no leaves. A horse is ugly, if it has no tawny mane along its neck. Feathers cover birds, and a woolly fleece makes sheep look beautiful. Attractive men have beards and bodies covered in rough hair. And here, on my forehead, in the centre, I only have one eye. But it is large, the size of huge shield. And think of this—does not the mighty Sun see everything from high up in the sky? And yet the Sun has but a single eye.

And in addition, my father Neptune rules your ocean waves. I'll give him to you as a father-in-law. Just pity me and hear me when I pray! I am your suppliant. I kneel to you, and no one else. Yet I spurn Jupiter and heaven and his piercing thunderbolt. You are the one I fear, Nereid. Your rage is crueler to me than a lightning strike. I'd find it easier to bear your scorn, if you were running off from everyone. But how can you reject a cyclops' love and yet love Acis? Why choose his arms instead of mine? Acis may please himself and you, as well (I wish that was not true), but, Galatea, if I could get the chance, he'd find my strength is every bit as great as my own body! I'd tear out his guts while he is still alive, rip his limbs apart, and throw them in the fields, scatter them there and in your sea (so he could mix with you). I burn with love. And when you injure me my flames get fiercer, till Mount Aetna seems to have shifted to my heart, for here inside I carry all its fire. Yet you do not care, Galatea, you do not care at all.”
After these laments—which were quite useless—Polyphemus rose (for I could see it all),
and, like a bull who has just lost a cow and is so furious it can’t stand still,
he wandered in familiar mountain glades and in the woods. Then the savage monster spied me and Acis—we did not think he could and so we had not worried. He cried out:

‘I see you! This is the last time you two will be making love—I’ll make sure of that!’

His voice was huge. He sounded just the way an angry cyclops should. His savage shouts made Aetna shudder. I was terrified and hurled myself into the neighbouring sea.
But my brave Acis, son of Symaethis, turned round and ran away, crying:

‘Help me,
Galatea, I beg you. Help me out!
Father, mother—let me in your kingdom!
I’m about to die!’

The cyclops followed him.

He hurled a rock torn from the mountain side.
Only the furthest tip of stone reached Acis,
but that was still enough to bury him.
I did the one thing Fate would let me do—made sure that Acis could assert the force his ancestors once had. Dark red blood seeped out from underneath the rock. Soon after that,
the redness in the blood began to fade.
At first its colour looked just like a stream disturbed by rain but slowly growing clear.
And then the boulder Polyphemus threw split open and a tall and living reed pushed through the cracks, and from the gaping split
the sound of gushing waters could be heard.
And then, a miracle! All of a sudden,

\[870\]
\[880\]
\[890\]

\(^1\) Acis is asking to be allowed to hide in the water to escape from Polyphemus. His mother was the daughter of a river god. Or the father and mother in question might be Galatea’s parents, Nereus and Doris, gods of the sea.
a youth emerged and rose up to his waist, with new horns wreathed in waving rushes. It was Acis, although this youth was larger and all his face was blue. But even so, it was still Acis changed into a stream, a river that has kept his ancient name.

After Galatea finished speaking, the group of nereids broke up and left, swimming away through tranquil waves. Scylla did not dare trust herself far out to sea, so she swam back to shore and wandered there on the thirsty sand without her clothes on or, when she was tired, found a lonely inlet and cooled herself in its secluded bay. Then, lo and behold, Glaucus came along, racing across the surface of the waves. He had come to live in the ocean deep not long before, when his limbs were changed across the sea from Euboea at Anthedon. When Glaucus caught sight of Scylla, he paused, his passion roused. He called to her, saying whatever he thought might stop her running. But she still sped away—fear made her swift—and reached a mountain top not far from shore. It had a huge ridge right beside the sea which rose up to a single wooded peak and leaned out to the water. Here she stopped and, from a safe location, looked at Glaucus, not knowing what he was, god or monster. She marvelled at his colour and his hair, which concealed his shoulders and clothed his back, and at his body, which, below the groin, was a twisting fish. He sensed her watching and, leaning on a rock that stood close by, spoke out:

“Young girl, I am not some monster or ferocious beast, but a god of sea. Proteus and Triton and Palaemon, son of Athamas, have no more power

---

1Anthedon was on the mainland of Greece, facing the island Euboea.
to control the ocean waves than I do.¹
In earlier days I was a mortal,
but still I was devoted to the sea.
Back then I even worked beside it. At times,
I used to haul in nets that trapped the fish or else I sat down on a rock and used my rod and line.

There is a stretch of shore lying next to pasture land. On one side is the sea, on the other grassy fields untouched by two-horned cattle feeding there.
No quiet sheep or shaggy goats had cropped it.
No hard-working bees had ever taken pollen from the flowers there. No garlands had been plucked to adorn men’s heads at feasts.
No hand had ever mown it with a scythe.
I was the first to sit down on that grass, drying my soaking nets and setting out the fish I’d caught. I laid them down in rows, so I could make a count of those whom chance had driven to my nets and those whose hopes had naively landed them on my barbed hook.
What happened next sounds like an untrue story,
but what advantage would I get from lies?
My fish laid on the grass began to stir.
They wriggled around and moved on land,
as if they were now swimming in the sea.
I was surprised, but then, as I waited,
the whole group of them escaped, slipping off into the sea where they belonged, leaving their new master and the shore. I was stunned.
What happened had me puzzled for a while.
I thought about a cause. Was it some god?
Or had some herbal juice brought this about?
I asked myself:

‘What plant has this effect?’

I pulled some of the grass and my teeth chewed the blades that I had picked. And once my throat ¹Palaemon was a young god of the sea. He had once been Melicertes, the mortal child of Ino and Athamas.

For Ovid’s account of how the infant Melicertes became Palaemon, see above 4.785 ff.
had swallowed the strange juices down, I felt a sudden throbbing deep inside my heart, and my breast was seized with a fierce desire to be in water. I could not stay there, so I hurled by body down into the sea, shouting out:

‘Farewell land! Never again will I be coming back!’

The gods of the sea accepted me. They thought me fine enough to be included in their company. So they asked Tethys and Oceanus to take away whatever mortal parts I might retain, and those two made me pure. A spell repeated nine times over purged my wickedness, and I was told to wash my body in a hundred rivers. Then streams at once poured out from various sources, their cleansing waters flowing past my head. That’s all I can describe of those events, which were amazing, all I can recall. My mind remembers nothing of the rest. When I sensed things once again, my body had completely changed from what it was before, and my mind was not the same. At that point, for the first time, I saw this dark green beard, this hair I sweep along through the wide sea, these massive shoulders and my azure arms, and these legs curving to a fish with fins. But still, what use is it to have this body or give delight to gods who rule the sea, what use is it to be a god myself, if you do not even care about these things?”

Glaucus paused, with still more left to say. But Scylla ran away. The god was hurt, angry at being rejected. He moved on towards the marvellous home of Circe, a daughter of the Titan Helios.
BOOK XIV

[Glaucus visits Circe and asks her help; Circe transforms Scylla into a monster; Aeneas continues his voyage; Aeneas abandons Dido, sails on to Italy, and consults the Sybil at Cumae; Aeneas visits the Underworld; the Sibyl tells her story; Achaemenides tells of his escape from Polyphemus; Macareus recounts the adventures he went through with Ulysses: Aeolus and the winds, the Laestrygonians, and Circe; Macareus recounts the story of Picus, Canens, and Circe; the Trojans bury Caiëta; Aeneas reaches Italy, marries Lavinia; Turnus fights the Trojans; Venulus visits Diomedes; Diomedes tells his story; Cybele saves the Trojan ships from fire, then sinks them; the ships change to sea nymphs; Aeneas triumphs over Turnus; Ardea falls, and a heron rises from its ashes; Aeneas becomes a god; the first kings of Alba; Vertumnus courts Pomona; Iphis is rejected by Anaxarete, who is turned to stone; Romulus founds Rome; Sabines war against the Romans; Venus saves Rome from Tarpeia’s treachery; peace is declared; Romulus becomes sole king; Romulus and Hersilia enter heaven as gods].

Glaucus, who now lived in the swelling seas of Euboea, had left Aetna behind, (a mountain sitting on a Giant’s jaws), moved past Cyclops’ fields (where plough and harrow were unknown and growing crops owed nothing to straining teams of oxen), past Zancle and walls of Rhegium across the sea, and through the narrow ship-destroying strait between two coasts which mark the boundaries of Italy and Sicily. He forged ahead, with powerful strokes, across the Tyrrhene sea and reached the grassy hills and halls of Circe, daughter of the Sun, whose lands were filled with various wild beasts. Once he’d seen her and the two had greeted one another, Glaucus cried:

“Goddess, I’m begging you—take pity on a god, for you alone can ease this love of mine, if you believe I’m worthy of your help. No one understands more than I do the power herbs possess,

1 The Giant under Aetna was Typhoëus, who had fought against Zeus and was imprisoned underground in Sicily, with Mount Aetna above his head. Zancle was a city in Sicily on the Straits of Messina and Rhegium the city in Italy directly across from it. The Tyrrhene Sea is alongside the west coast of Italy. Glaucus is moving around the end of Italy and northward up the coast. Circe, as mentioned previously, was in Greek mythology the daughter of Helios, the Titan god of the sun. She was not a daughter of Apollo, whom Ovid usually identifies as the god of the sun.
for they once changed my shape. O Titan’s child, if you are ignorant of why I feel such frantic passion, I will tell you.
I saw Scylla on a beach in Italy, facing Messana’s walls. I am ashamed to talk about my promises, my prayers, and my entreaties. Scylla scorned them all.
So if your charms have any influence,
then let your sacred lips recite a spell,
or if some herbs would have more potency,
apply the proven force of tested plants.
I am not asking you to make me well or heal these wounds of mine. There is no need to end my love. But let her have her share of the heat I feel.”

Now, no one has a heart more likely to catch fire than Circe does (the cause of that could be within herself, or else Venus, upset when Circe’s father talked about what he had seen her doing, could have placed those urges deep inside her),
so she replied: ¹

“It would be preferable to chase someone whose wishes and desires matched your own, a person captivated by an equal passion. And you deserved to be the one pursued (there is no doubt you could have been), and if you offer hope,
there will be those who court you willingly.
Trust me. If you doubt that and have no faith in your appearance, then consider me, a goddess, daughter of the glorious Sun,
who has great power with spells and potions, and yet I promise to be yours. So spurn the one who spurns you, and reward the one who now pursues you. In that single act let your revenge repay the two of us.”

¹The Sun had observed the adulterous affair of Venus and Mars and had informed Vulcan, Venus’s husband. For Ovid’s treatment of the story see 4.249 ff. above.
The goddess tried to tempt him in this way, but Glaucus answered:

“While Scylla is alive, forest leaves will flourish in the ocean and sea weed in the hills, before the love I feel for her will ever change.”

Circe was annoyed. She could not injure Glaucus (and, because she loved him, did not wish to), so she took her anger out on Scylla, the girl he had preferred to her. Enraged her love had been rejected, she quickly ground up some poisonous herbs, whose juices were well known for their hideous effects, and, once she had beaten them to powder, she added certain spells from Hecate. Wrapped in a dark blue cloak, she left her home, moved through the pack of fawning animals, and made for Rhegium, across the strait from Zancle’s rocks. Walking atop the waves and raging currents, as if setting her feet on solid ground, and keeping her feet dry, she skimmed along the surface of the sea.

There was a small bay, shaped like a curved bow, which Scylla loved for its tranquility. When the Sun was halfway through his orbit, at his height, and cast the smallest shadows, she used to go there to escape the heat from sky and sea. Knowing she would go there, Circe spikes the waters, polluting them with monstrous poisons and sprinkling juices squeezed from noxious roots. Her magical lips then mutter a cryptic incantation—thrice nine times!—a dark, mysterious spell. When Scylla comes and wades into the sea up to her waist, she sees around her groin some hideous barking monsters. At first, not thinking they are part of her own body, she tries to run away and drive them off, fearful of the creatures’ slavering mouths. But what she seeks to flee, she drags with her, and when she checks her thighs and legs and feet, she finds, instead of these, the gaping jaws of Cerberus. She stands there, surrounded by a ferocious pack of raging dogs, whose backs below her pelvis hold her up and out of whom her shortened thighs and belly now emerge.

Her lover Glaucus wept for her and ran from Circe’s arms. The way she’d used her power with herbs had been too cruel. Scylla remained there. The first chance she got, she acted on the hate she felt for Circe, by snatching away Ulysses’ comrades and later would have sunk the Trojan ships, if she had not been earlier transformed into a reef, whose rocks, even today, protrude above the surface of the sea, a hazard sailors still avoid.

The oarsmen in the Trojan ships rowed on past Scylla and ravenous Charybdis. As they approached the shores of Italy, winds drove their ships back to the Libyan coast, where the queen, Sidonian Dido, welcomed Aeneas to her home and heart. But when they parted and her new Trojan husband went away, she found the loss impossible to bear. Pretending to offer up a sacrifice, she had a pyre built, then took a sword and killed herself, deceiving everyone, just as she had been deceived.

Aeneas moved off once more, fleeing the brand new walls of Dido’s city in the sand. Carried back to the land of Eryx and loyal Acestes, he made a sacrifice and offered presents

---

1Charybdis was a monster in the form of a whirlpool on the side of the strait opposite Scylla.
2Aeneas married Dido, who was building the city of Carthage in North Africa, but then left her in order to fulfill his destiny of founding his own city in Italy.
at his father’s tomb. Then, after Iris, on Juno’s orders, almost burned his ships, Aeneas set sail, moving past the realm of Aeolus, grandson of Hippotas, and lands with clouds of boiling sulphur fumes, past those island rocks where the Sirens dwell, the daughters of Acheloüs. His ship had lost its pilot, but kept sailing on past Inarime, Prochyte, and Pithecusae, built on a barren hill, a place whose name is taken from the tiny apes that live there. Once long ago, the father of the gods, disgusted with the frauds and perjuries of the Cercopes and the criminal acts of that deceitful people, changed them all into misshapen beasts, making them look like human beings and yet unlike them, too. He shrunk their limbs and made their noses flat, bent up towards the forehead, scarred their cheeks with furrows and the wrinkles of old age, and then, after covering their bodies with yellow hair, he sent them to this place, but not before he took away their speech, the power of those tongues born for deceit, thus leaving them unable to complain except with strident shrieks.

When Aeneas had passed these places and left behind him on his right the walls of Parthenope and on his left the tomb of Misenus, a trumpeter and son of Aeolus, he moved on to the swampy shores of Cumae, full of marshy sedge, and then into the cave of the long-lived Sibyl, entreating her to let him venture through Avernus to find his father’s shade below. For a long time,

---

1The land of Eryx is Sicily and Acestes is a king there. Aeneas’ father, Anchises, had died on the journey.
2For the story of how the daughters of Acheloüs became the Sirens, see above 5.859.
3These names refer to islands off the west coast of Italy.
4Sibyls were prophetesses who could read the will of the gods. Avernus was a region in Italy where people believed there was access to the Underworld. Parthenope was the name of the city that later became Naples.
the Sibyl kept her eyes fixed on the ground, but then, inspired by the god within her, she finally replied:

"You are a man who has done great things, whose right hand has stood the test of war, whose faith was proved in fire. What you are seeking is a mighty gift! But, Trojan, do not fear, for you will have what you desire and, with me to guide you, will see the dwellings of Elysium, the strangest kingdom in the universe, and the shade of your beloved father. There is no path which virtue cannot tread."

As the Sibyl said this, she pointed out a branch of shining gold among the trees sacred to Avernian Juno, telling him to break it from the trunk. Aeneas did so and beheld the power of dread Pluto. He saw his ancestors and the old ghost of Anchises, his great-hearted father. He also learned about that region’s laws and all the dangers he would have to face in future wars.

On his way back from there, as with weary steps he trudged along the trail, Aeneas tried to ease the tiring effort by conversing with his guide from Cumae, and, while moving up the daunting pathway through the darkening twilight, said to her:

"Whether you are actually divine or someone truly favoured by the gods, you will always be just like a goddess in my eyes, and I will confess my life comes as a gift from you, for you let me observe the places of the dead and then, when I had seen them, led me back again.

---

1Elysium was a special place for those shades of the dead who had been given an afterlife much happier than the one in Hades.

2Avernian Juno is a title sometimes given to Proserpine, goddess of the Underworld.
To repay your kindness, when I return and reach the upper air, I will construct a temple in your honour and offer gifts of frankincense to you.”

The priestess looked at him and, with a heavy sigh, replied:

“I am not a goddess. And it is wrong to honour human beings with a gift of holy frankincense. Just to make sure you do not, in your ignorance, do wrong, I will tell my story. Phoebus Apollo was in love with me and made an offer—
I could have eternal, never-ending life,
if I surrendered my virginity.
While he was still hoping to persuade me and before I had agreed to his request, he wished to bribe me with some gift and said:

‘Virgin of Cumae, choose what you want.
You will have whatever you desire.’

I pointed to a heaped-up pile of dust and asked him if he would give me as many birthdays
as those particles of dust, but like a fool,
I did not ask that all those years should come with ageless youth, as well. Still, he offered me the years and eternal youth, provided I would have sex with him. I spurned his gift and stayed unmarried. Now my happier years have passed me by and, on tottering steps, a sick old age comes on, which I must bear a long time yet. I have already lived through seven generations and still must see three hundred harvests, three hundred vintages, to match the number of those bits of dust.
The day will come when that long stretch of time will shrink my body from its present shape and my appendages, worn out with age, will shrivel to a trifling size. And then, it will not seem that I was ever loved or that I pleased a god. Phoebus himself may well not recognize me or perhaps he will deny he was my lover once.
I will be changed so much that men will say they cannot see me. But they will know me by my words, for the Fates will leave my voice.”

As the Sibyl said this, climbing along the rising path, Trojan Aeneas moved from the Stygian realm up into Cumae, a city men from Euboea had built.
When, following his usual practices,
he had offered sacrifice, he went out along the shore, which later on was named after the nurse who once had cared for him.

Here, too, Macareus from Neritos, a comrade of adventurous Ulysses,
had settled after long and weary travels.
He saw the Trojan group and recognized Achaemenides, who he thought was dead, abandoned years before on Aetna’s rocks.
Amazed to see him so unexpectedly—
and still alive—Macareus shouted:

“Achaemenides! What god or chance saved you from death? Why are you, a Greek, on board a boat of barbarous Trojans?
And that ship of yours, where is it heading?”

Achaemenides, no longer wearing rags and bits of clothing held in place by thorns, was now the man he used to be. He said:

“May I look on Polyphemus once again and those jaws of his dripping human blood, if this ship is not a finer place to me than home and Ithaca and if I honour Aeneas any less than my own father.¹
If I did everything I could for him, there is no way I’d ever demonstrate ¹Achaemenides was one of Ulysses’s comrades sailing back from Troy. He and a few others were captured by Polyphemus, the cyclops. In Homer’s Odyssey Polyphemus eats a number of the men he has trapped in his cave. Ulysses tricks Polyphemus, blinds him, and leads his men back to their ship.

sufficient gratitude. Could I forget or not give thanks that I can speak and breathe and gaze upon the sky and glorious sun? Aeneas saw to it that this soul of mine did not pass through the cyclops’ gaping mouth. Even now, if I were to lose my life, I know I would be buried in a tomb and not that monster’s belly. How did I feel, when you left me behind and I saw you sailing out to sea? Well, my fear wiped out all sense and feeling. I wanted to call out, but was afraid I’d give myself away to Polyphemus. Even Ulysses, when he gave those shouts, almost sunk your ship. ¹ I saw the cyclops tear a colossal rock away from the mountainside and toss it far out into the middle of the sea. I watched again as his gigantic arms hurled massive stones, just like a catapult. Forgetting I was not aboard the ship, I was terrified the waves and boulders might sink us all. But when you got away, escaping certain death, Polyphemus wandered all across Mount Aetna, groaning, groping with his hands among the trees, and, without his eye, stumbling on the rocks. He stretched his bloodstained arms towards the sea, cursed the race of Greeks, and cried:

‘O if some chance would only bring Ulysses back to me or one of his companions, then I would vent my rage on him and eat his innards. My hands would rip apart his living flesh, and I would fill my gullet with his blood. His torn-off limbs would quiver in my teeth. And then losing my eye and going blind would be no loss, or else a trivial one.’

He was so enraged, he kept on shouting things like this and more. A ghastly terror ¹As Ulysses was sailing away from the island, he shouted taunts at the blind cyclops on the shore. Polyphemus hurled two rocks in the directions of the sound and almost swamped the Greek ship.

gripped me, as I saw his face still soaked in gore, his savage hands, his eye ball’s gaping socket, his limbs and beard still caked with human blood.

Death was there, right before my eyes, and yet of all my troubles that mattered least of all. I thought that any moment he would seize me and then stuff his stomach with my innards. My mind kept seeing a picture of the day I watched the bodies of my two companions being smashed repeatedly against the ground and Polyphemus, like a shaggy lion, jumping on them, swallowing their organs and their flesh, with bones and marrow, too, cramming their trembling limbs, still half alive, in his voracious gut. I shook with fear and stood there shocked, blood draining from my face, as I observed him at his bloody feast, chewing and belching and vomiting up pieces of human bodies mixed with wine. I thought he was preparing a fate like that for me, as well, and so for several days I hid myself, startled by every sound, afraid of death, but longing to be dead, relieving my hunger pangs with acorns and a mix of grass and leaves—all alone, without hope or help, left abandoned there to my afflictions and my death. But then, after some time, I saw a ship far off. I ran down to the shore and by waving begged them to rescue me. And they were moved—that Trojan ship welcomed a Greek on board! And now, my dearest comrade, you tell me what you’ve experienced with Ulysses and that group of men, who, along with you, risked life and limb to sail the open sea.”

Macareus then spoke about how Aeolus, grandson of Hippotas, ruled the Tuscan sea, and how that god had shut up all the winds in an ox-hide bag, which Aeolus then gave to the man from Ithaca, their leader, an amazing gift. Sailing on from there with favourable breezes for nine days, Ulysses and his men could see the land they wished to reach. But when the tenth day dawned, Ulysses’ crew were overcome with greed and a desire for plunder, so the men, thinking the leather bag contained some gold, untied the strings which kept the winds confined. These winds then blew the ship away from land, back through the seas it had just sailed across, until it once more sailed into the port of Aeolus, their king.

Macareus continued with his story:

“From there, we went to the ancient town of Lamus, a Laestrygonian, where Antiphates ruled. I was sent to him with two companions. We had to run away. I only just escaped, with a single comrade. The other man, the third one in our group, was eaten by the Laestrygonians—their evil jaws turned red with his dark blood—and as we fled, Antiphates came after us, urging his people to attack. They charged at us, hurling rocks and tree trunks, destroying ships and drowning men. But one ship got away, with Ulysses and the two of us on board. Full of grief and mourning our lost comrades, we reached that land which you can see out there, in the distance (and trust me when I say that island is best seen from far away). You are a goddess’ son and the finest of the Trojans—for now the war is over, I cannot hold you as an enemy—but, Aeneas, I warn you—stay away from Circe’s coast!

We dragged our boat ashore on Circe’s island, but, remembering Antiphates and the savage Cyclops, we too refused to move on any further. Not knowing anything about the place, we held a lottery to choose some men to go and check the house. My name was drawn, so I was sent to enter Circe's walls with Eurylochus, faithful Polites, 390 Elpenor (who was much too fond of wine), and eighteen comrades. But when we got there and stood right by the entrance to her home,
a thousand wolves, with bears and lions, too, rushed up to us. We were all terrified.
But there was no need for us to be afraid.
The beasts had no desire to injure us.
They fawned on us, wagging their friendly tails,
and followed our tracks, until some servant girls received us and led us through a hallway roofed in marble to their mistress, Circe, who was sitting in her lovely chamber on a stately throne, dressed in a fine robe, with a golden cloak around her shoulders.
Nereids and nymphs are there together.
Their deft fingers are not working fleeces or spinning slender thread, but setting herbs in proper order, sorting out in baskets flowers and variously coloured grasses lying strewn in piles. Circe oversees the work they do, for Circe understands the power of each leaf and the effects herbs have when they are properly combined.
She watches closely and inspects each batch as it is weighed.

When Circe saw us
and we had greeted one another, her face looked pleased and seemed to us to indicate our prayers were answered. Without delay she gave orders for a drink to be prepared from toasted barley grains, honey, strong wine, and curdled milk, all combined together.
Secretly she added special juices,
whose taste the sweetness of the drink would hide.
Her divine right hand offered us some cups,
and we accepted them and had a drink,
for we were thirsty, and our lips were parched.
Then that fearful goddess picked up her wand

---

1In Homer's Odyssey, Elpenor has too much to drink and, as a result, falls off the roof of Circe's house, killing himself.
and with it quickly tapped us on the head.
And then—I am ashamed to tell this part,
but I'll continue—hair began to grow
all over me, I could no longer speak, but gave out raucous grunts instead of words.
I began to bend, till my entire face was staring at the ground. I felt my mouth harden into a turned-up snout, my neck grew strong and fat, and these hands of mine, which, a minute before, had raised the cup,
now were leaving footprints in the ground.
I was shut up in a sty with others,
all in the same state (that's how powerful those magic drugs can be!). But we noticed Eurylochus was the only one of us whom Circe had not changed into a pig,
the only one who had declined the cup when it was offered. If he'd not done that,
I'd still be there, one of those bristly swine, even today, for he would not have run and told Ulysses of the great disaster, and Ulysses would not have come to Circe to pay her back. Peace-bearing Mercury gave him a whitish flower growing out from a dark black root (gods call it moly).
Protected by that plant and heaven's warnings,
he entered Circe's home, where she asked him to take the poisoned cup. But when she tried to stroke his hair, he knocked away her wand, drew his sword, and terrified the goddess.
She backed away. But then the two of them pledged their good faith by shaking their right hands, and Circe took Ulysses as her husband, welcoming him in bed. There he asked her,
as a wedding gift, to give his comrades their old bodies back. So she sprinkled us with more wholesome juices of unknown herbs, reversed her wand, and tapped us on the head,
while muttering some charms to neutralize the ones she used before. The more she spoke, the more we stood erect, moving upward from the ground. The bristles on our bodies all dropped off, in our cloven feet the split soon went away, our shoulders reappeared, with arms and forearms properly in place. With tears of joy, we embraced our leader, hanging on his neck (and he had tears, as well). We told him nothing of what we’d been through, until we had expressed our gratitude.

We stayed on Circe’s island one whole year, and in that time I witnessed many things with my own eyes and ears. Among them all, there is a story one of the servant girls who used to take part in the sacred rites told me in secret. While Circe was away, spending time with Ulysses on her own, this servant took me to a young man’s statue, a figure carved from marble white as snow, and on his head he had a woodpecker. It stood in a sacred shrine and was wreathed with many garlands. Well, I wished to know who the young man was, why he was worshipped in a temple, and why the bird was there. So I asked the servant girl, and she replied:

‘Listen, Macareus. Pay attention to what I say, and you, too, will find out the powers of my mistress, Circe. Picus, a son of Saturn, was a king who ruled Ausonia. He loved horses trained for use in warfare. This hero looked the way you see him here. You get a sense of how good looking he was and, from this, a statue of him, you can recognize his true appearance. And his character matched his good looks. As for how old he was, he could not yet have seen four times those games they hold in Grecian Elis each fifth year. His handsome looks made him enticing to dryads born on Latium’s mountain hills. Nymphs of the fountains sought his company, and naiads, too, the ones Albula bore, those born in waters of Numicius, and in Anio’s stream and flowing Almo.

---

1 Ausonia was the name of a region in southern Italy and sometimes refers to Italy generally.
2 This reference is to the games held at Olympia, in the Peloponnese.
(whose stretch of water is so very short),
and from the rushing Nar and Farfarus, with its dark shade, and those who haunt the pool of Scythian Diana in the woods and nearby lakes. But Picus spurned them all and fixed his heart on just a single nymph, the daughter of a god, two-faced Janus.
They say Venilia gave birth to her on Palatine hill. When she was mature and ready to get married, she was given to Picus of Laurentum, whom she preferred to all her other suitors. Her beauty was exceptional, but her skill in singing even rarer still and, given that gift, they called her Canens. That sweet voice of hers could attract the trees and rocks, tame wild beasts, hold back flowing streams of lengthy rivers,
and arrest birds in their wandering flight.
One day, when she was singing melodies in her delightful voice, Picus left home astride a lively horse, to hunt wild boar who roamed around the lands of Laurentum.
He wore a purple cloak pinned with a clasp of yellow gold. His left hand held two spears.

Now, Circe, daughter of the Sun, had left Circaean fields (which get their name from her)
and come to those same woods, wishing to pick fresh herbs from fertile hills. Hidden by trees, she glimpsed the youth and right away was stunned.
Her hand let go the herbs she had collected, and she felt as if a burning flame had seared her bones right to the marrow. When the shock had passed and Circe had regained her wits, she was about to say what she desired,
but could not come up close enough to him,

---

1Albula was an old name for the Tiber river, running through the site of Rome. The Numicius was a river in central Italy. The Anio was a tributary of the Tiber, as were the Almo, a very short stream, and the Nar. The Farfarus was a river in Umbria. Diana is called Scythian because her worship is said to have come into Italy from Scythia.

2Janus was an Italian god with two faces looking in opposite directions. The Palatine was one of the hills in Rome.

3Canens, from the verb cano, means singing.
for his horse moved fast and his companions formed a group around him. So Circe cried:

‘Although the wind may carry you away, you will not escape, if I know my skill, if my herbs have not lost all their power, and if I am not wrong about my spells.’

After she said this, Circe conjured up an insubstantial image of a boar and ordered it to run out past the king, right before his eyes, and then seem to go into a thick clump of forest, where the trees were really dense and no horse could enter. Without a moment’s pause, Picus instantly followed the image of his prey, not knowing it was false, quickly jumping off the back of his sweat-soaked horse, to move ahead on foot, proceeding through the deep part of the wood, in pursuit of a vain hope. Meanwhile, Circe muttered prayers and magic incantations, worshipping unknown gods with unknown chants, the ones she used for darkening the face of the snowy Moon and drawing thirsty clouds across her father’s head. So back then, too, as Circe sang her spells, the sky grew dark and the ground breathed mist. The king’s companions wandered along blind trails, and Picus lost the escort guarding him. Having prepared the time and place, Circe said:

‘By your eyes which have captivated mine, by your form, you most beautiful of men, which makes me, though I am a goddess, your suppliant, accept this love of mine, and take the Sun, who sees all things, as your father-in-law. Do not treat Circe harshly and reject a Titan’s daughter.’

---

1Circe’s father, as mentioned before, was in Greek mythology, the Titan god of the Sun.
Circe’s plea ended.
Picus fiercely spurned her and her appeals,
crying out:

‘I am not the one for you,
no matter who you are. Another woman holds me captive, and I pray she holds me for a long, long time. As long as the Fates keep Janus’ daughter Canens safe for me, I will never break the vows that bind us
by having an affair with any stranger.’

Circe kept repeating her entreaties,
but in vain. So she said:

‘You will not leave here without being punished. Nor will you return to Canens. Now you are going to learn what a woman slighted in her love can do, for Circe is a woman who’s in love,
and you have spurned her!’

Circe turned around,
twice towards the west, twice towards the east, then touched young Picus with her wand three times and three times uttered spells. Picus ran away but was amazed to find that he could run more quickly than before. On his body he saw wings appear. Then he grew annoyed that he had so suddenly been added to the strange new birds of Latium’s woods and pecked hard oak trees with his solid beak and, in his rage, inflicted injuries on their long branches. Feathers on his wings took on the purple colour of his cloak, and the golden brooch holding it in place turned into feathers, so around his neck there was a ring of gold. Nothing remained of what Picus had been, except his name.¹

Meanwhile, his comrades call out repeatedly, shouting for Picus throughout the countryside,

¹Picus is the Latin for woodpecker.
without success. Then they come on Circe (by this time she has cleared away the mists and let the sun and wind disperse the clouds).
They badger her with charges (which are true), demand their king, make threats they will use force,
and are prepared to fight her with their spears.
She starts to sprinkle venomous juices and harmful potions, calling on the Night and gods of Night from Erebus and Chaos, and prays to Hecate in long wailing cries.
Then (amazingly!) the trees spring upward from their places, the ground begins to groan, the neighbouring woods turn pale, and the grass
where Circe sprinkled is soaked with drops of blood.
It seems as if the rocks are groaning harshly, dogs are barking, black snakes are slithering along the ground, and thin shades of the dead are flitting about. The men all shake with fear, astonished at these marvellous events.
As they watch in terrified amazement,
Circe taps their faces with her magic wand,
and, at its touch, those youthful men are changed into wild animals of various kinds.
Not one retains the human form he had.

The setting Sun had bathed Tartessian shores, while Canens’ eyes and heart waited in vain for her husband to return. The people and her servants carried lamps and rushed around all through the forest, trying to find him.
Although the nymph wept and tore her hair and beat her breast, all that was not enough.
She forced herself outside and moved around in a frantic state through the Latian fields.
Six nights and six returns of the sun’s light saw her going over hills and valleys, as chance might lead. She did not eat or sleep.
River Tiber was the last to see her,
as she laid her body down on his wide banks, worn out by grief and wandering. And there she wept and, as she mourned, sang quietly, pouring out her sorrow, just as a swan

1The name Tartessus is a reference to the western coast of Europe.
on the point of death sings its funeral song.
At last her grief dissolved her very bones, down to the tender marrow. Gradually she pined away and vanished in thin air.
But where she died still recalls her story,
for ancient muses rightly called the place
after the nymph and named it Canens.'

In that long year at Circe’s home, I heard many tales like that and witnessed many things.
But when we had grown lazy and lethargic from relaxing for so long, we were ordered to hoist sails again and set out to sea.
When Circe, the Titan’s daughter, told us
our voyage would be long and perilous, with many dangers from the raging sea lying in wait for us, I must admit
I was afraid, so when I reached these shores,
I went no further with them and stayed here.”

Macareus ended. Then they buried Aeneas’ nurse in an urn of marble.
On it the Trojans carved this brief inscription:

_The man I nursed, whose piety men praise, saved me, Caieta, from the Argive blaze and here cremated me in righteous ways._

Loosening cables from the grassy shore,
they left that treacherous island far behind,
where the notorious goddess had her home,
and sailed on towards those wooded regions
where the river Tiber, covered in shade, pours out his yellow sands into the sea.
And there Aeneas seized the royal house and married the daughter of Latinus, son of Faunus, though not without a fight.
He had to war against a hostile people,
and Turnus fought hard for his promised bride.’
All Etruria clashed with Latium,

---

1The daughter’s name was Lavinia. She had already been promised to Turnus, king of the Rutulians, a people in Latium.
an anxious, drawn-out struggle, with both sides seeking hard-won victory.

The two armies tried to increase their ranks with foreign help. Many men supported the Rutulians, and many helped defend the Trojan camp. Aeneas was successful seeking help from Evander’s walls, but Venulus made a futile trip to Diomedes, who was now an exile, but had founded a great city in the realm of Daunus, in Iapygia, and held land there awarded to him as a marriage gift.¹ Venulus carried out what Turnus ordered and requested aid, but Diomedes, an Aetolian hero, declined to help. He was unwilling to commit himself or the forces of his father-in-law in such a fight. He claimed he had no men of his own race whom he could arm for war. He said to Venulus:

“In case you think these are excuses, I will force myself to tell my story, though to talk of it rekindles painful grief.

After high Ilium was on fire and its citadel had fed the Grecian flames and Locrian Ajax had seized a virgin in a virgin’s shrine, bringing to all of us the punishment which he alone deserved, the Argive fleet was scattered, its ships driven by the wind across unfriendly seas.² We Greeks on board

---

¹Evander had founded a town on the future site of Rome. Venulus was an ambassador sent by Turnus. Diomedes was an important warrior chief in the Achaean forces at Troy (as we learn in Book 13). He had been forced out of his own city in Greece (as he explains below). Daunus was a king in Iapygia, a region in south-east Italy.

²Locrian Ajax (the Lesser Ajax) was the son of Oileus (not to be confused with the Greater Ajax, who had debated Ulysses for the arms of Achilles and, when he lost, had killed himself). During the sack of Troy, Locrian Ajax assaulted Cassandra, a daughter of Priam, in the temple of Minerva, thus bringing divine anger had to cope with rain, thunderbolts, darkness, raging skies and waves, and, last but not least, the Caphereus rocks.¹ I won’t detain you with every detail of these sad events, but back then even Priam might have thought Greece deserved some pity. Still, in my case, warrior Minerva took good care of me, kept me alive, and saved me from the deep. But then I was forced out of my homeland once again, for that gentle goddess Venus, remembering the old wound I gave her, demanded punishment.² I had to face such mighty hazards on the open sea and such great challenges in war on land, that many times I called those soldiers happy who’d perished in that storm we all went through and in the restless Caphereus waves. I often wished I had been one of them. By now my comrades had experienced the utmost miseries of war and sea and had lost their courage. So they begged me to put an end to all our wandering. But Acmon, who had a fiery temper and at that time was even more incensed at our disasters, shouted:

‘At this point, men, what is there still left which your endurance would refuse to bear? What more can Venus do, beyond all this, assuming she might wish to? While there are still more dreadful things to fear there is room for prayer, but when men’s lot is as bad as it can get, they trample fear beneath their feet, and the most grievous ills do not concern them. Let Venus herself hear what I say. Let her despise the men Diomedes leads—and she does despise us—

---

¹ Caphereus was a headland on the island of Euboea where several of the ships returning from Troy were wrecked.
² In Homer’s Iliad, Diomedes wounds Aphrodite/Venus on the battlefield (scratching her wrist). In Homer’s account of the war, Aphrodite/Venus consistently supports the Trojans.
we still scorn her hatred. Her great power is hardly great to us.’

These words of Acmon,
who came from Pleuron, insulted Venus and stirred her ancient rage.1 Few of the men approved of what he’d said, and most of us, who were his friends, told Acmon he was wrong.
But when he tried to speak, his voice grew thin,
as did his throat, his hair turned into feathers,
his shrivelled neck, his chest and back had plumage,
with larger feathers covering his arms.
His elbows bent around to form light wings,
his feet were mostly toes, his mouth grew stiff and hardened to a horny pointed beak.
Lycus, Idas, Abas, and Nycteus watched in amazement, with Rhetenor, too,
and, as they stared, they took on the same form.
Most of my crew flew up on beating wings and circled round the oarsmen. If you ask what these birds formed so suddenly looked like,
they were quite similar to snowy swans, although they were not swans. As for myself, though I’m a son-in-law of royal Daunus, Iapygia’s king, I find it difficult to hold this home as well as these dry fields with the small group of comrades who remain.”

Diomedes, grandson of Oeneus, had nothing more to say. So Venulus left the realm of Calydon, then travelled on past Peucetia’s gulf and reached Messapia, where in the fields he saw a hidden cave concealed in reeds, with many trees for shade.2
At that time goat-god Pan lived in the cave, but it had once been occupied by nymphs.
A shepherd from that region of Apulia had scared these nymphs and sent them running off in sudden fear. They soon regained their wits and, ignoring the man pursuing them,

1Pleon was a city in Aetolia, near Epirus.
2The land controlled by Diomedes, given to him as a wedding gift, was called Calydon after the Greek city.
Peucetia and Messapia were regions in southern Italy.
BOOK FOURTEEN

resumed their choral dance, moving their feet to match the rhythm. The shepherd mocked them, mimicking their dance with ungainly jumps and adding foul abuse and filthy insults. He did not shut his mouth until his throat was wrapped in wood, for he became a tree, and from its juice you sense his character, for bitter berries of wild olive trees bear traces of that man’s insulting tongue. The harshness of his words moved into them.

When the ambassadors returned from there and reported Diomedes had refused to assist them with Aetolian troops, the Rutulians still carried on the war they had prepared for, without that help. Plenty of blood was shed on either side. Turnus attacked, bringing his hungry flames against the pinewood fleet, and Trojans feared those ships the waves had spared would sink in fire. Already Vulcan’s flames had set alight pitch and wax and whatever else would burn and were moving up the high masts to the sails. In the curving ships the benches smouldered. But then the sacred mother of the gods, remembering these pines had been cut down on Ida’s summit, filled the air with sounds of beating cymbals and shrill boxwood pipes.¹ As her tame lions drew her through thin air, the goddess cried:

“Turnus! Your profane hands are hurling fire in vain. I will save the ships! I will not allow your ravenous flames to burn what once was part of my own grove. Their bodies are my own.”

Once Cybele spoke, there was at first a growl of thunder and then a heavy rainstorm fell, with pelting hail. The four fraternal winds, Astraeus’ sons, rushed into battle and with sudden gales ¹The sacred mother of the gods is Cybele.

whipped up the air and swollen heavy seas.¹ Then all-nourishing mother Cybele, using one wind’s force, snapped the hempen ropes on the Trojan fleet, swept the ships away headlong out towards the sea and sank them.
As the drowned wood softened, it turned to flesh,
and curving stern posts changed to heads with faces.
Oars were transformed to toes and swimming legs.
What used to be a hull became a flank.
The central keel, running below the ship, changed to a spine, the rigging and the ropes were now soft hair, and yardarms turned to limbs.
Their colour stayed the same, a dark blue green.
As naiads of the sea, with young girls’ games
they splash around in waves they used fear,
and though they come from rocky mountainsides, they dwell in gentle seas, quite unconcerned about their origin. But those naiad nymphs do not forget the numerous dangers they had to face so often from the sea, and frequently they place their helping hands on ships tossed by a storm, except for those which have had Greeks on board. For to this day, they still remember the collapse of Troy and hate the Greeks. They watched with happy smiles when Ulysses’ ship was wrecked and felt great joy to see that boat of Alcinoüs transformed into a rock, as stone replaced its wood.²

When the fleet turned into living sea nymphs, there was some hope that the Rutulian force,
through fear of this amazing miracle, might end the fight. But Turnus would not stop.
Each side had its gods, and each had courage,
which matters just as much in war as gods.
But now they were no longer waging war
to obtain a dowry or a kingdom, or the sceptre of a father-in-law,
or even you, virgin Lavinia.
They fought because each wanted victory

¹Astraeus was a Titan who fathered the four major winds.
²Alcinoüs, king of Phaeacia, organized a ship to take Ulysses back home to Ithaca. Neptune was outraged and turned the boat on its return journey into a rock in the sea.
and would have felt disgraced if he had stopped. Finally Venus saw her son prevail, and Turnus fell, as did Ardea, too, a city which, while Turnus was alive, was thought to be so strong. When savage fires had consumed the place and all its houses were buried in hot ash, a bird flew out, a kind no one had ever seen before. It rose up from the middle of the ruins, beating the embers with its flapping wings. Everything that fits a captured city was in that bird—in its cry, its leanness, and its pallor. In it the city’s name lives on, for people call it ardea, or heron, and every time it beats its wings, the people of Ardea mourn their fate.1

The virtues of Aeneas had now forced all the gods, including even Juno, to bring their ancient quarrels to an end.2 And since the fortunes of young Iūlus, his growing son, had been firmly secured, it was time for the heroic son of Venus to enter heaven. Venus had petitioned gods above on her son’s behalf and now, throwing her arms around her father’s neck, she said:

“You’ve never been unkind to me, but now I’m begging for a special favour. Please grant my Aeneas, who, through my blood, is your grandson, a touch of the divine, however small, so long as you give some. He has already crossed the river Styx and seen the hateful kingdom of the dead. One visit is enough!”3

---

1 I have added the English and Latin names of the bird to clarify the meaning of these lines.
2 The ancient anger of the gods goes back to the Judgment of Paris, when the Trojan prince gave the apple “for the fairest” to Venus, rather than to Juno or Minerva, an action which led to the abduction of Helen, the Trojan War, and the animosities among various gods who took sides in that human conflict.
3 For Aeneas’ trip to the Underworld, see 14.153 ff.
The gods agreed.
Even Jupiter’s wife did not look unmoved and nodded her consent, and her face showed that she was satisfied. Then Jupiter spoke:

“You are worthy of this gift from heaven,
both you who ask and he for whom you ask.
My daughter, you may have what you desire.”

Jupiter spoke. Venus was overjoyed.
She thanked her father and then, borne away through light air by her harnessed pair of doves, reached Laurentum’s shore, where the reedy stream of the Numicius winds its way down to the nearby sea. Venus told the stream to cleanse Aeneas of all those parts of him which could be harmed by death and carry them in his silent currents deep into the sea.
The river god with horns performed the task that Venus had assigned, and his waters purged Aeneas of what was mortal in him, washing it away. His best parts remained.
Once his body had been purified, his mother anointed it with heavenly perfume, wiped a special ointment on his lips,
a mixture of ambrosia and sweet nectar,
and transformed Aeneas into a god.
The Roman people called him Indiges
and welcomed him with altars and a shrine.

After that, Alba and the Latin realm were under the rule of Aeneas’ son who had two names, Ascanius and Iülus.
Silvius succeeded him, and his son, Latinus, took the name and ancient sceptre of his ancestor. After Latinus famous Alba reigned, and then Epytus.
The first king following him was Capys, than Capetus. After them, Tiberinus inherited the realm and, when he drowned in a Tuscan stream, it acquired his name, the Tiber. He had two sons—Remulus and fierce Acrota. Remulus was older, but was wiped out by a strike of lightning

THE KINGS OF ALBA
while trying to imitate its fiery flash.¹ More moderate Acrota passed the sceptre to valiant Aventinus, who was buried on the very hill where he had once been king, a hill to which he gave his name. After him, Proca ruled the people of the Palatine.²

Pomona lived during king Proca’s reign.
In Latium no other hamadryad had more skill than she did in her garden or was more attentive to the fruit trees from which she got her name.³ Streams and forests did not interest her. She loved the countryside and branches bearing ripening apples.
In her right hand she did not clutch a spear, but held a pruning knife she used sometimes to cut back plants whose growth became too lush, or slice off branches spreading here and there.
Sometimes she slit the bark to graft a stem,
providing nourishment for different stock.
She never let her plants get dry and thirsty, but trickled water on the winding tendrils of the roots to let them drink. Pomona loved her orchard. It was her great delight.
She did not want the love which Venus brings,
but still, afraid of some uncouth attack,
she built a wall around her orchard grounds,
to stop men, whom she shunned, from reaching her.
What did those men not do in their attempts to get their hands on her—the youthful satyrs, whose age made them well suited for a dance,
the Pans with wreaths of pine around their horns, Sylvanus, always younger than his years,
and Priapus, the god whose pruning hook and massive penis frighten thieves away?⁴

¹Apparently, in order to impress his subjects, Remulus constructed machines to imitate the noise of thunder and the flash of lightning.
²The Aventine Hill was one of Rome’s seven hills. Palatine was another.
³Pomum is the Latin for fruit. A hamadryad is a wood nymph.
⁴Sylvanus was a Roman god of the fields, wood, and flocks. Priapus was a minor rural deity noted for his huge, permanently erect penis. The Pans were deities of the woods.
Now, Vertumnus adored this nymph, as well. He loved her more than any of the rest. But he had no more luck than other men. O how many times did he disguise himself as a simple reaper and bring her baskets filled with ears of grain, the very image of a farmer who has just brought in his crop! He frequently showed up with fresh-cut hay around his head, as if he could have come from turning new-mown grass, and many times he clutched an ox goad in his solid fist, so one could take an oath he had just finished unharnessing his weary team of bulls. If given a knife, he was a pruner who dressed and tended vines, if a ladder lay across his shoulder, you could well think he was setting out to pick some apples, if he held a sword, he was a soldier, and with a rod, he was a fisherman. In fact, with these numerous disguises he often was allowed inside the garden, where he could enjoy himself by gazing at Pomona's beauty. Once he even came as an old woman leaning on a stick, wearing a coloured scarf, with graying hair around his temples. He gained admittance, walked in the beautifully tended garden, admired the fruit trees there, and said to her:

"It makes you seem even more attractive!"

And to emphasize his praise, he kissed her a few times in a way no real old woman ever would have done. Then, stooping over, he sat down on the grass and gazed upward at branches loaded down with autumn fruit. There was a splendid elm tree facing him holding clumps of shining grapes. Vertumnus stared at the tree and its companion vine, and said:

---

Vertumnus was an Italian god of the changing seasons.
“But if this tree stood by itself and was not wedded to the vine, it would have nothing anyone would want to take except its leaves. And the vine now resting on the elm and joined to it would lie there on the ground, if not wedded to the tree and leaning on it. And yet you are not moved by this example of the tree and vine, for you shun marriage and have no desire to join with anyone. O I wish you did! You would have more suitors pestering you than Helen did or Hippodamia who made the Lapiths fight the centaurs, more than Penelope, Ulysses’ wife, when he spent all that time away from home. Even now, when you reject all suitors and run from them, a thousand men want you, along with gods, demi-gods, and spirits, all those deities who haunt the Alban hills. But if you are wise and want a good man for your husband and wish to hear the words of a woman who is older and loves you more than all the others, more than you think, then decline all common offers and choose Vertumnus as a partner for your bed. I can vouch for him, for I know him well, just as well, in fact, as he knows himself. He is not one to wander round the world, roaming everywhere. He remains right here and farms the land. And unlike most of those pursuing you, he does not fall in love with some young girl he’s only just now seen. No. You will be his first and final love. To you alone he will devote his life. Besides, he is young with natural charm. He can also quickly disguise himself in any shape. And if you order him to go through all of them, he will become whatever you command. What’s more, you both like similar things. He is the first to get the apples which you grow and is so happy when his hands are holding gifts from you.

1 The Alban hills were a few miles south of Rome.
But this time he does not desire the fruit from your orchard trees or those garden herbs with their sweet juice. The only thing he wants is you. Take pity on his flaming love, and imagine that the one who loves you is here in person pleading through my lips. You should fear the avenging deities (for Idalian Venus hates unfeeling hearts) and the wrathful memory of Nemesis. To make you fear them more, I will recount a tale from Cyprus, a well-known story (for my old age has taught me many things). It may make you easier to persuade and help you change your mind.

Once, long ago, Iphis, a man of humble parentage, saw noble Anaxarete, a girl descended from the blood of ancient Teucer. When he saw her, he felt the flames of love in every bone. He fought against that fire for quite some time, but once he realized his reason could not overcome his passion, he went as a suppliant to her door, where he talked about his aching feelings to the young girl’s nurse and appealed to her, by the hopes she had for Anaxarete, not to be too hard on him. At other times, he spoke to each of the servant women, complimenting them and trying very hard to win goodwill and ask for favours. Often he gave them tablets to deliver, full of his flattering words. And sometimes he hung garlands damp with dewy tears up on the doorpost and would lie down there, across her threshold, with his tender ribs resting on hard stone, cursing the harsh bolts that barred his way.

---

1Here, as before, Ovid refers to the goddess of retribution by the name of Rhamnus (see 3.623). The phrase Idalian Venus refers to Idalium, a mountain in Cyprus.

2Teucer, the Greek warrior leader at Troy, survived the war and arrived home, but was banished by his father Telamon for not avenging the death of Ajax. Teucer went to live in Cyprus, where he founded the city of Salamis.
But Anaxarete, crueler than the surging sea when the stars of those Young Goats sink down, harder than iron refined in fires at Noricum or rock in its natural state, still fixed in place, spurned and mocked him. And to these spiteful acts, she added proud, insulting words, as well,
robbing the man who loved her of all hope.
Iphis could not endure the agony of his long torment, and before her door he cried out these last words:

‘Anaxarete,
you win! You will no longer have to bear my pleas to you, which you find tedious.
Prepare your joyous triumph and call on Paean, god of victory! Crown your brows with splendid laurel! For you have conquered, and I am glad to die! Your iron heart should start rejoicing, for surely you must now find something you can praise about my love,
an action I have done to make you happy, and admit I had some worth. Remember that the love I feel for you did not end before my death. Now, in the same instant,
I lose the lights of life and love together.
No rumour will announce my death to you,
for I will come in person. Do not doubt that.
I will be there. You will see me present, and you can feast those cruel eyes of yours on my lifeless corpse. But, you gods above, if you see what mortals do, remember me (my tongue can pray for nothing more than that).
In times to come let people tell my story,
and to my fame add on those extra years you’ve taken from my life.’

Iphis finished.
He raised his weeping eyes up to the doorposts where he had often hung his wreaths of flowers.

---

1The Haedi or Young Goats were two stars in the constellation Auriga. Their setting was associated with severe storms. Noricum, a region between the Alps and the Danube, was famous for its iron.
Then, lifting his pale arms to the lintel
he attached a rope, made a noose, and cried:

‘Here’s a garland you will find delightful, you mean and vicious girl!’

He thrust his head
inside the noose and hung there, his throat crushed, a mournful, heavy sight. And even then he was still facing her. His twitching feet kept kicking at the door, making a sound which seemed to be demanding to come in,
and when the door was opened, people saw what he had done. The servants gave a shout and cut him down, but it was now too late.
They took the body to his mother’s home (for his father had passed on). She hugged him to her breast, embracing the icy limbs of her own son. When she had said the words a mourning parent says and done those things
a grieving mother does, she walked, in tears, and led the mourners in a funeral march through the centre of the city, bearing the pale corpse on a bier toward the fire.
As it so happened, the sad procession made its way down a street close to the home of Anaxarete, and their laments came to the ears of that hard-hearted girl, whom now some god of vengeance forced to act.
For all her stony heart, the sounds of mourning moved her, and she said:

‘Let us take a look at this sad funeral.’

She went upstairs
to a rooftop room with open windows and, looking down, saw Iphis lying there, stretched out on his bier, and in that instant
her eyes froze, the warm blood left her body, and she turned pale. She tried to step away but both her feet were rooted to the floor, and when she strove to turn her face aside,
she found that was impossible, as well.
Little by little, the stone that had lived so long in her hard heart gained possession of her body. And if you think this tale is just a story, there is a statue of that lady still kept in Salamis, a place which also has a temple shrine which people call Venus Prospiciens, the Venus who looks on.

Remember this,
my nymph. I beg you put aside your pride, which has gone on too long, and join yourself to the man who loves you. Then cold weather will not hurt your budding fruit in springtime, and gusting winds will not remove your flowers.”

The god Vertumnus, in old woman’s clothes, told the story, but it had no effect.
So he took off his costume and returned to being a young man once again. To her he seemed just like an image of the Sun when his most brilliant light breaks through the clouds that hide his face and shines out unopposed.
Vertumnus is ready to use force with her, but there’s no need. The beauty of the god has seized the nymph, and she feels a passion equal to his own.

Unjust Amulius
was the next king to rule Ausonia, relying on military force. But then, old Numitor, who had lost the kingdom,
got it back—a present from his grandson—
and on the day of Pales’ festival, they marked the founding of their city, Rome.¹

The Sabine chieftains, led by Tatius, waged war against them, and when Tarpeia showed them the way to take the citadel, she received the punishment she deserved—

¹Numitor had been removed from the throne by his younger brother Amulius. Numitor’s grandson, Romulus, killed Amulius and restored Numitor to the throne. Pales was a goddess of flocks and herds. The walls of Rome were built by Romulus. being crushed beneath a pile of weapons.¹ Then some men from Cures, their voices hushed like silent wolves, attacked the Roman guards while they were fast asleep and charged the gates which Romulus, son of Ilia and Mars, had closed and firmly barred.² But then Juno, Saturn’s daughter, opened one of the gates, which swung back on its hinges silently.³ Venus was the only one to notice that bars holding the gate had fallen off.
She would have pushed them back, except no god ever is permitted to reverse the acts of other gods.

The naiads of Ausonia lived close to Janus’ temple, in a spot kept moist by waters from an ice-cold spring.
Venus went to these naiad nymphs for help.
They did not refuse, for what the goddess asked of them was just. So they called upon the streams and rivers which supplied their spring.
But not even they could block the Janus gate.
It was still open. The flowing water had not barred the way. And so those nymphs placed yellow sulphur in the bubbling spring and warmed its hollow veins with burning pitch.
By this and other forceful means, the heat moved down the spring, to the very bottom, and those waters which, a moment ago,
could dare to rival freezing Alpine cold,
were now so hot they matched the heat of fire!
Both doorposts by the entranceway now smoked from fiery spray, and the gate which promised to let tough Sabines through the city walls was now, thanks to these new waters, blocked, until the warlike Romans armed themselves.
After that, Romulus led his armies

¹The Sabines were a people living near Rome. Tarpeia was the daughter of the Roman commander of the citadel. She let the enemy in, demanding some payment. Tatius ordered his soldiers to give her, as her reward, their shields, telling his troops to throw them at her, all at once, so that she was killed.
²Ilia was the daughter of Numitor.
³Juno would here seem to be continuing her hostility to the descendants of Trojan Aeneas, even though Ovid tells us the gods’ quarrels were concluded earlier (see 14.885 above).
outside the walls, and Roman ground was strewn with Sabine bodies and with Rome’s own sons. The blood of son-in-law and father-in-law was mixed by evil swords, until at last they all resolved they would not fight it out to the bitter end but let peace end the war and Tatius have a share in ruling Rome.

When Tatius died, then you, Romulus, ruled both people equally. At that point, Mars removed his helmet and spoke these words to the father of both gods and men:

“Father, now the Roman state has firm foundations and does not depend on just one champion. It is time for you to hand out that reward you promised me and your worthy grandson. Raise Romulus from the earth, and set him here in heaven. For you once said to me when we were in a council of the gods (I well recall the gracious words you spoke and made a note of them):

‘There will be a man whom you will raise to the azure heavens.’

That’s what you said. So let those words of yours be carried out in full.”

Jupiter nodded.

Then the all-powerful father of the gods hid the sky behind dark clouds and terrified the world with thunder rolls and lightning strikes. Mars knew this was a sign allowing him to carry off his son, as he’d been promised. Leaning on his spear he boldly vaulted into his chariot. The horses were in place, straining underneath the blood-stained pole. With a flick of his whip he urged them on, and, driving his team headlong through the air, landed on the top of wooded Palatine. There he swept up the son of Ilia, who was administering royal laws to his own people. The mortal body of the king disappeared into thin air, just as, in mid flight, a lead ball often melts when the broad strap of a catapult sends it hurtling through the sky. After that, his form was beautiful and more appropriate for the lofty couches of the heavenly gods, like Quirinus in ceremonial robes.¹

Romulus’ wife, Hersilia, mourned him when he was gone. But then royal Juno ordered Iris to go down her curving path and tell the widowed queen of her commands:

“O queen and chief glory of your people, the Latin and the Sabine race, worthy in earlier days to have been the wife of such a mighty hero, you now deserve to be with Quirinus as his consort. So end these tears of yours. If you desire to see your husband, follow where I lead, to that lush grove on the Quirinal hill, which shades the temple of the Roman king.”

Iris obeyed and, gliding down to earth on her coloured rainbow, spoke to the queen, as Juno had commanded. Hersilia found it difficult to look at Iris and, in all modesty, replied:

“O goddess, (for though I cannot tell who you might be you clearly are divine), lead the way, then. Lead on and let me see my husband’s face. If Fates will give me just one glimpse of him, I will declare that I have entered heaven.”

They did not linger. With Thaumas’ daughter Hersilia climbed the hill of Romulus. There a star fell, gliding from sky to earth. Its fiery light set the queen’s hair ablaze, and with that star she rose up in the sky.

¹Quirinus was a Sabine deity, identified with Romulus.
The founder of the Roman city held her with the hands she knew so well and changed her, both her name and the way she looked before. [850]
Now he calls her Hora. She is a goddess, united with her partner Quirinus.
BOOK XV

[Numa succeeds Romulus; Numa goes to Croton; Hercules visits Croton; Myscelus founds a new Greek city in Italy; Pythagoras moves to Croton; Pythagoras proclaims his philosophy: vegetarianism, as in the Golden Age, immortality of the soul, doctrine of metempsychosis; constant changes in nature and human bodies, the four elements, geological changes, different effects of different waters, Mount Aetna’s fire, spontaneous generation, the phoenix, strange animals, the rise and fall of civilizations, the destiny of Rome (Helenus’ prophecy to Aeneas), immorality of eating meat; Numa becomes king, educates the Romans in arts of peace; Numa dies; Egeria mourns him; Hippolytus tells her the story of his death and return; Egeria is transformed; the story of Romulus’ spear; Cipus grows horns and refuses to enter Rome; Aesculapius comes to Rome; Julius Caesar is made a god; Venus tries to prevent his assassination; the gods send omens to warn of the disaster; Jupiter reveals the future triumphs of Augustus; Julius Caesar becomes a star; the poet celebrates the achievements of Augustus; Ovid’s final words.]

Meanwhile Rome was looking for a leader who could succeed great Romulus as king and bear the weight of such a heavy burden. Then Fame, prophetic messenger of truth, selected famous Numa for the throne. He was not satisfied merely to know the rituals of the Sabine people, for his wide-ranging mind was keen to think about much grander schemes and to explore the nature of things. This passion of his led him to leave Cures, his native town, and travel to Crotona, where Hercules had once been well received.¹ When Numa asked who could have been the very first to found a Grecian city in Italian land, one of the citizens, an older man with knowledge of the past, gave this reply:

“They say that Hercules, Jupiter’s son, coming back by sea with a splendid herd of cattle he had taken in Iberia, after a prosperous voyage landed at Lacinium on the coast.”² And then, while his cattle grazed on tender grasses, he went in person to the friendly home

¹Cures was a city near Rome, and Crotona a Greek city in southern Italy.
²Lacinium was a coastal promontory near Crotona. of mighty Croton, to renew his strength
by resting after his extended labour.
As he was leaving, he remarked

‘In future,
when your grandsons are alive, this place
will be a city.’

And what he promised did come true. An Argive man called Alemon had a son Myscelus, whom the gods loved more than anyone his age. Hercules, the club-wielding god, went to Myscelus when he was fast asleep, leaned over him,
and said:

‘Come, leave your father’s land and seek the pebbled streams of the distant Aesar!’

And Hercules made many fearful threats
if he did not obey. Then the god and sleep both disappeared together. Myscelus got up and, saying nothing, thought about the vision he had only just received, going through a lengthy struggle with himself.
The god was telling him he had to go,
but the law prevented him from leaving.
The punishment for anyone who wished to change his native land was death. By now, the shining Sun had hidden his bright face beneath the Ocean, and the darkest Night had raised her starry head, when Hercules seemed to appear again, threatening him in the same way and warning Myscelus his punishment would be much more severe if he failed to carry out his orders.
Myscelus was afraid and at once began preparing to move his paternal goods into a foreign land. But in the city people talked, and he was brought to trial for disobeying the law. His accusers presented their case first. When it was clear

†The Aesar was a river in southern Italy.
the charges had been proved without the need for witnesses, the wretched prisoner raised his face and hands to the gods above and shouted out:

‘O you, whose twelve labours gave you the right to a place in heaven, I’m begging for your help! You are the one who drove me to this crime.’

Now, long ago it was the custom to vote with pebbles, black ones to declare the person guilty, white ones to acquit, and in this case, too, the harsh result was rendered in this way. Every pebble placed in the cruel urn was black, but then, when they tipped it over and poured the pebbles out to tally them, their colour had been changed from black to white. So, through the sacred power of Hercules, Alemon’s son was favoured in the verdict and set free.

Myscelus thanked his patron, Amphitryon’s son, and with following winds sailed across the Ionian Sea, passing Neretum, a city where Sallentines lived, Sybaris, Tarentum (a Spartan settlement), the bay of Siris, Crimisa, and fields of Iapygia.1 Once he had he passed these lands that overlook the sea, he found the Aesar estuary, his destined home, and close beside it a burial mound which covered Croton’s sacred bones. So here, Myscelus built his city, naming it after the man who had been buried there.”

This was the way the city first began, according to the best-received traditions, and the reason it was built in Italy.

---

1Amphitryon was king of Thebes and married to Alcmena, the mother of Hercules. However, the real father of Hercules was Jupiter. The Ionian Sea is between Greece and southern Italy. Myscelus is moving around the heel of Italy and up the west coast towards Latium. The series of names refers to people and places near or on the coast of southern Italy.
There was a man living in Crotona called Pythagoras, who was born in Samos
but had fled that island and its rulers and gone into exile of his own free will, because he hated tyranny. In his thoughts he visited the gods, although they lived far off in distant regions of the sky, and what nature has denied to human sight his mind could see. Once he had scrutinized all things with his inner eye and studied them with care, he made his knowledge public and taught his silent audience, who heard and were amazed by what he had to say about how the vast universe began, about how things are caused, what Nature is,
what gods are, where the snows originate,
where lightning comes from, whether Jupiter or wind makes thunder when clouds split apart, what forces make Earth shake, what laws control the motions of the stars, and everything that lies hidden away from human sight.
He was the first one to complain about wild beasts being killed and served for dinner, the first to say things like the following (judicious words, indeed, but not believed):

“O you mortal beings, stop corrupting your own bodies with such defiling food.
We have grain, apples weighing branches down,
along with grapes which ripen on the vine.
You can use fire to cook sweet-tasting plants and make them tender. There is no lack of milk or honey smelling of the fragrant thyme.
Munificent Earth offers you her wealth, producing feasts of harmless things to eat,
without the need for blood and slaughter.
Some beasts feed on meat, but many do not,
for horses, sheep, and cattle live on grass.
Those whose temperament is wild and savage—
Armenian tigers, raging lions, bears,
as well as wolves—delight in blood-soaked meat.
How wrong it is to feed our flesh with flesh,
to fatten up our gluttonous bodies
by eating bodies, to let one creature live BOOK FIFTEEN

by bringing death to other living things. Is it really true that, with all this wealth the Earth, the best of mothers, offers us, nothing pleases you unless your savage teeth bring back the eating habits of the cyclops and gnaw on pitiful wounds? Can you men not satisfy the ravenous hunger pangs inside your greedy and intemperate gut unless you butcher other living things?

That earlier time, which we call Golden, was happy with its harvests plucked from trees and crops the earth produced. Men did not stain their mouths with blood. Birds winged their way in safety through the air, hares roamed unafraid in open fields, and fish were not hauled up on hooks because they were so credulous. There was no treachery in anyone, no fear of fraud. All things were filled with peace. Then someone, whoever he was, acting against the common good, was envious of what the lions ate, and stuffed raw meat into his greedy stomach, thus opening the road to crime. It may well be the case that at the start men’s gory swords grew hot from slaying animals, but that’s all right, for I concede that men may kill those beasts intent on killing them. That is no sin. But while such creatures may be put to death, it is not right for men to eat them, too.

From that time on the wickedness spread further. The pig is thought to be the first wild beast men felt deserved to die, for its broad snout dug up the seeds and killed the hoped-for harvest. And then men led the goat away to die on Bacchus’ altars, as a punishment for chewing on his vines. And so the harm these animals went through was their own fault. But what have sheep done to deserve the same? O you peaceful flocks, born to serve mankind, you bear sweet milk for us in your full udders and grow the wool from which we make soft clothes. Your life serves us so well, more than your death.
What have oxen done, simple, harmless beasts, without fraud or deceit, and born for toil? That man is truly an ungrateful wretch, unworthy of the gift of harvest grain, who, after he has just relieved his ox by freeing it from the heavy, curving plough, can kill the creature who has tilled his fields, hacking its worn down neck with his sharp axe, when with its help he has so many times worked hard to open up hard earth and sow so many harvests. Even crimes like this are not enough, for men involve the gods in their own wickedness when they believe that killing toiling cattle brings delight to higher powers in heaven! A victim of outstanding beauty, without a flaw (its pleasing looks make it a sacrifice), adorned with gold and garlands, is led out before the altars. In its ignorance, it hears the praying priest and sees him shake the grain it helped produce across its forehead, between the horns. And when the beast is struck, its blood then stains the knives which earlier it may have seen reflected in still water. Next, while the animal is still alive, its lungs are quickly ripped out from its chest, and priests probe into them to ascertain what gods may be intending. And after this, (the human craving for forbidden food has so much force) you dare to eat that meat, you race of mortal men! Do not do this, I beg you, and keep my admonitions in your mind! Know and understand this well: when you put the meat of slaughtered cattle in your mouths, the food you are devouring is flesh from those who labour on your land.

And since a god is urging me to speak, I will follow, as I should, the deity who moves my lips and tell you what I know of Delphi and of very heaven itself. The oracles of a majestic mind I will unlock and sing of mighty things left unexplored by previous intellects.
and long concealed. It pleases me to move among the lofty stars, and I delight in leaving earth and this dull home behind to ride up on the clouds and stand up there on mighty Atlas’ shoulders looking down on men from far away, as they scurry everywhere, with no good sense or reason, and to unfurl for them the scroll of Fate and comfort them in their anxiety and fear of death, by speaking words like these:

'O race of men, so stricken by your dread of icy death, why do you fear the Styx, and shadows of the dead and empty names, the stuff of poets, the terrors of a world which is not there? For you should not believe these bodies of ours, whether destroyed by funeral fires or ravages of age, can suffer any further injuries. For our souls do not die. Once they depart an earlier dwelling place they always find new homes, and, once received in there, live on. I myself at the time of the Trojan war (and I remember this) was Euphorbus, a son of Panthous, whose chest was pierced by a heavy spear from Menelaus, a son of Atreus. Not long ago, in Argos, that city ruled by Abas, I recognized in Juno’s holy shrine the shield I used to hold on my left arm! Each thing changes, but nothing ever dies. The spirit wanders, roaming here and there, and takes possession of a creature’s limbs, whatever body it desires, passing from savage animals to human beings, from human beings to beasts, but spirits never are destroyed. Just as pliant wax shaped in a new form does not stay the same as what it was before or keep its shape, and yet in essence does remain the same, so, according to the principles I teach, our souls always continue on unchanged, passing into various body shapes. And thus, in case your stomach’s appetite overwhelms your natural affections,
I warn you: stop this wicked butchery which drives the souls of your own relatives out of their homes. Do not feed blood with blood.’

And now that I am being transported over the great sea and have spread my sails and filled them with the wind, I will go on.
Nothing in the whole universe persists.
Matter is always changing. Particular things arise as transitory images,
and even time itself, like a river,
keeps flowing on with never-ending motion.
For like the running stream, the fleeting hour can never stop. As one wave drives another, chasing the one in front, while being pursued by one behind, in just that way time’s moments run ahead and follow and are always new.
For what was once ahead is left behind,
what did not exist comes into being,
and every passing instant must give way to some fresh instant. You observe how night completes its course and passes into day, how the light of dawn replaces darkness.
The colour of the sky is not the same at midnight with all weary things at rest and when bright Lucifer on his white horse emerges. Its colour changes once again when the herald of the day, Aurora, paints the world she must hand on to Phoebus.
The Sun god’s shield is red when it is rising from underneath the earth and red once more when sinking down below, but at its height the shield is brilliant white, because up there the aether is more pure and far removed from earth’s contagion. And Moon at night cannot remain the same, keeping her shape the way she was before—if on the wane tomorrow she will be smaller than today,
and if her orb is waxing, she will grow.

Besides, have you not noticed how the year travels through a sequence of four seasons, and in this imitates the way we live?
For early spring, with its new life, is tender and full of juice, and very like a child. Then the plants spring up, fresh but delicate, not yet robust, and kindle farmers’ hopes. It is the time when all things are in flower. In fertile fields the coloured blossoms dance, but there is still no strength in any leaves. As summer follows on the spring, the year, now sturdier, displays his youthful strength. No season is more vigorous or rich, none glows with greater heat. Next Autumn comes, all youthful passion spent, ripe and mellow, in temperament halfway between our youth and our old age, his temples flecked with gray. And then comes aged, trembling wintertime, with tottering steps. He has lost his hair, or else the hair he has is now quite white.

And our bodies, too, are always changing. They never stop. Tomorrow we will not be what we have been or what we are today. There was a time when, early in our lives, we lived inside our mother’s womb as seeds, mere hopes of mortal beings. Then Nature put her skilful hands to work, refusing to let our twisted bodies stay concealed inside the belly of our swollen mother, and sent us out into the empty air. Brought out into the light, the infant lies there, helpless, but soon, just like a quadruped, he moves his limbs the way wild creatures do, and gradually, with something for support to help his trembling sinews, he stands up on shaky knees, not yet quite firm enough. Then he grows strong and swift, passing through his youthful stage, and soldiers on through years of middle age, then glides along the path of his old age, where life declines, a time which undermines and saps the strength he had in earlier years. Old man Milon weeps to see his arms, once strong and muscular, like those on Hercules, hang limp and scrawny.¹

¹Milon was a citizen of Crotona famous for his great strength.
And Tyndarus’s daughter Helen cries to see an old crone’s wrinkles in the glass and wants to know why she’s been ravished twice.
Devouring Time and you, hateful Old Age, destroy all things. The teeth of passing years gnaw everything to shreds, and gradually you two swallow them all in a drawn-out death.

Even those things we call the elements do not remain the same. Focus your minds, for I will show the changes they go through.
The everlasting universe contains four substances which generate all things.
Two of these, earth and water, are heavy and sink down from the force of their own weight.
The other two, air and fire (a substance more rarefied than air) lack any weight.
If nothing holds them back, they try to move up to the heights. Though these four elements are distinct in space, all of them arise from one another and resolve themselves back into one another. When earth breaks down, it liquefies and turns into clear water,
water, once it becomes less dense, changes into wind and air, and when air loses weight and turns into the subtlest element, it flashes out as high aetherial fire.
Then they reverse their order and go back, traversing the same stages as before—fire grows more dense, turns into heavy air, air changes into water, and water,
as it grows more dense, changes into earth.

And nothing retains its shape. For Nature, who renews all things, keeps recreating one form from another. And, believe me, nothing in the entire universe can die,
but things do alter, changing how they look.
What men call ‘being born’ is just the start of turning into something different from what was there before, and ‘dying’ means ceasing to remain in the same form.
Though this thing may perhaps change into that,
and that to this, the total sum of things remains unchanged.

For my part, I believe nothing retains the same appearance long. Thus, the ages passed from Gold to Iron, and many times the fortunes of a place have been upended. I myself have seen what once was solid earth turn into sea and looked at land created from the waves. We notice sea shells lying far from shore, and on a mountain summit men have found an ancient anchor. A flow of water creates a valley where there was a plain, floods have carried off and flattened mountains, swampy areas have changed to arid sand, and thirsty lands to stagnant marshy pools. In one place nature opens up fresh springs, while in another closing off their flow. Rivers may burst forth, disturbed by tremors deep inside the earth, or they may dry up and disappear. Thus, the river Lycus, once swallowed by a chasm in the earth, is reborn from a new source and flows on far away. The mighty Erasinus in one place is pulled down, flows underground, and emerges once again in Argos. They say the river Mysus grew ashamed of his first source and his original banks and now, as the Caicus, flows elsewhere. The Amenanus, too, in Sicily, can sometimes flow so fast it churns up sand, but then at other times its sources stop, and it dries up. The river Anigrus, which in earlier days was fit to drink, now flows with water you would never touch, not since the time the centaurs used that stream to wash the wounds inflicted by the bow and club of Hercules (unless, of course, we stop believing all tales poets tell). Is it not true the river Hypanis,

---

1Lycus was the name of a river in Lydia. Erasinus was a river in Arcadia which disappeared and then re-emerged.
born in the Scythian hills, once tasted sweet, but has been ruined now with acrid salt?¹

Antissa, Pharos, and Phoenician Tyre at one time were surrounded by the sea. None of these cities is an island now.²

Inhabitants of Leucas long ago worked in fields connected to the mainland. The place is now encircled by the sea. Zancle, too, they say, was linked to Italy, until the sea destroyed the boundary and waves flowed in to carry off the land.³

If you look now for Helice and Buris, once Achaean cities, you will find them buried in the waves, and sailors, even now, like to point out these inundated towns with walls beneath the sea.⁴

Near Troezen, where Pittheus was king, there is a mound, steep and bare of trees, which some time ago was the most level part of the whole plain. Now it is a hill. How this came to be is a strange tale. Fierce and powerful winds shut up in hidden caverns wished to find some outlet for their gales and vainly fought to enjoy the open sky. But their blasts had no way out, for in their prison cell there were no cracks at all. And so those winds put pressure on the ground and made it swell, the way our human breath inflates a bladder or the skin of a horned goat. After that, the swelling stayed and, as the years went by, it hardened, so it looks like a steep hill.

¹The Hypanis river flowed into the Black Sea.
²Antissa was an island in the Aegean, thought to have once been a part of Lesbos. Pharos had been an island off the Egyptian coast, until soil deposited by the Nile joined it to the mainland. Tyre, a city in Asia Minor, had been built on an island. Now it was part of the mainland.
³Leucas had been a peninsula on the coast of Acarnania. Zancle was a coastal city in Sicily on the strait separating Italy and Sicily.
⁴Helice and Buris, cities on the coast near Corinth, were destroyed by an earthquake and flooded by the sea. Their ruins could be seen under the water.
Though many more examples of such things occur to me from what I have been told or learned about myself, I will list here just one or two. Think of water. Does it not take on and generate new forms, as well? At noon the waters of horned Ammon’s spring are freezing cold, but when Sun is rising or declining they grow warm.¹ People say the Athamanians set fire to wood by pouring water from this spring on it when Moon has shrunk down to her smallest size.² The Cicones live by a stream whose water, once drunk, turns inner organs into stone and, when it touches things, spreads over them a layer of marble. The Crathis river and the Sybaris (which is close to here, near our own lands) can change a person’s hair and make it look like amber or like gold.³ Even more amazing are those rivers capable of changing not just bodies but even minds, as well. Who has not heard of Salmacis, with its disgusting pools, or of those lakes in Ethiopia where anyone who drinks becomes insane or falls into a deep and wondrous sleep?⁴ Whoever drinks from the Clitorian spring avoids all wine and in his sober state enjoys pure water. This may well take place because there is some power in the water which works against the warm effects of wine.⁵ Those who live there give another reason—after Melampus, Amythaon’s son, had with his spells and herbal potions saved Proetus’ raving daughters from the Furies, he threw the medicines which purged their minds into the spring, and that is why its waters generate a strong distaste for wine.⁶

¹Ammon was a spring and lake in Libya.
²Athamanis was in Dodona, where Jupiter had an important shrine.
³Crathis was a river in Arcadia, and Sybaris a river near Crotona.
⁴For Ovid’s account of why the Salmacis has disgusting waters, see above 4.418 ff.
⁵Clitorium was a town in the Peloponnese.
⁶Proetus was king of Argos. His daughters were driven mad by Venus for boasting of their beauty.
BOOK FIFTEEN

The flowing stream of the Lyncestius has an opposite effect. Whoever swallows some of it, even a small amount, stumbles around, as if he had been drinking unmixed wine.¹ Arcadia has a place (Pheneus was its name in earlier days) whose waters are mistrusted, for they have two different effects. During the night you must beware, for then a drink does harm, but in the day its water is quite safe. Thus, various lakes and rivers can possess quite different properties.

Ortygia, once a floating island, is now fixed in place.² Men on the Argo feared those clashing rocks, the Symplegades, and the spray tossed up by crashing waves. And now they do not move, but stand fixed in place, defying tossed winds. Mount Aetna, glowing with its furnaces of blazing sulphur, will not always burn and was not always burning in the past. For if Earth is a living animal with many passages that breathe out flames, then, every time she moves, she can remake those breathing holes. She can seal some up and open others. Or if rapid winds imprisoned in deep caves hurl rocks together with matter which contains the seeds of flame, and friction causes Aetna to catch fire, the caves will cool off once the winds calm down. Or if the fires are blazing bitumen and yellow sulphur burning with less smoke, surely, after many ages have gone by, that rich supply of food the earth provides will be used up and it will have no fuel to feed the flames. Without the nourishment their greedy nature craves, the flames will starve, and, as they die, will starve Mount Aetna’s fire.

¹Lyncestius was a river in Epirus.
²Ortygia is another name for the island of Delos. For Ovid’s story of it as a floating island see Book 6.
They say that in Pallene, in those lands beyond the northern winds, there are some men who cover their skin with downy feathers by plunging in Minerva’s pool nine times.\(^1\)

As far as I’m concerned, this is not true, but people claim that Scythian women have spells to do this, too, by sprinkling limbs with magic potions.

But if what you believe relies on what experience can prove, you must have seen that corpses when they rot, because of time or melting heat, are changed to tiny animals. We know full well that if you take a sacrificial bull and bury the tossed-out carcass in a ditch, from every portion of the putrid entrails flower-sipping bees will rise. And these bees, just like the animal from which they spring, live in the fields, love toil, and work with hope. A war horse buried in the ground becomes a source of hornets, and if you remove a land crab’s hollow claws and put the rest below the ground, then from that buried part a scorpion will emerge and threaten you with its hooked tail. As farmers have observed, those grubs which cover leaves in country fields with their white thread change into butterflies, their shape transformed to emblems of the dead.\(^2\)

And mud contains the seeds that generate green frogs, which, when they first appear, lack feet. Soon it gives them legs well formed for swimming and makes the back ones longer than in front, adapting them to jump huge distances. When she gives birth to young, a mother bear does not produce a cub but a mere lump of living flesh, barely alive. But then, by licking it, she gives that lump its limbs and turns it into something with a shape just like her own. And have you not observed

---

\(^1\)Pallene was a mountain in Thrace.

\(^2\)The butterfly was an emblem of the dead because its transformation from a worm into a flying creature reminded people of the escape of the soul from the body at death.
how grubs from honey bees which lie contained in their hexagonal cells have bodies but no limbs and how their legs come later and then, even later still, their wings?

Who could imagine, if he did not know, that Juno’s bird, whose tail plumes carry stars, and Jupiter’s eagle with the lightning bolt, and Venus’ doves, and every race of birds come into being from inside an egg?

Some people claim that when the human spine is buried in a tomb and rots, its marrow is transformed into a snake.

The elements of all these animals originate from other species. But there is one bird which reproduces and renews itself all on its own. Those in Assyria call it the phoenix. It does not live on grain or grasses, but eats drops of frankincense and balsam sap. And when this bird has lived five centuries, it builds itself a nest in a swaying palm tree, in the branches at the very top, using its chaste beak and claws. Then, after it has lined the nest with bits of cassia, smooth ears of nard, pieces of cinnamon, and yellow myrrh, it sits down on the top and ends its life in the perfumed air. And, so people say, from the father’s body a small phoenix is reborn, destined to remain alive for just as many years. When this bird’s age has made it strong enough to bear the weight, it lifts the heavy nest from the high branches and piously removes its father’s tomb and its own cradle, flying through the air towards the city of the Sun, and there, inside the temple of Hyperion, it puts it down before the sacred doors.

---

Juno’s bird was the peacock.
If there is anything astonishing in these strange events, we might well wonder how hyenas can alternate their sex, with a female who has just been mounted by a male now becoming male herself.
Then, too, there is an animal which feeds on winds and air. When it touches something it at once takes on that object’s colour.
Conquered India once gave its lynxes to Bacchus, god of the grape-bearing vine.
Every time these beasts discharge their bladders, so men report, the liquid turns to stone which hardens from its contact with the air.
And coral, which, while underneath the waves,
remains a tender plant, grows hard, as well,
in just this way, when it is touched by air.

The day will end and Phoebus’ weary horses will plunge into the sea before my words can mention all those things that have been changed into new forms. So with revolving time we see some nations growing powerful and others in decline. Troy, for instance, which was so great in wealth and citizens and for ten years could squander so much blood, is now a humble ruin. Ancient stones are all it has to show, and all its wealth lies in ancestral tombs. And Sparta, too, was famous once, great Mycenae flourished,
as did Athens, king Cecrops’ citadel, and Amphion’s city, Thebes. But Sparta now consists of worthless land, and proud Mycenae has collapsed. What is Oedipus’s Thebes except a story? And Pandion’s Athens—what remains of that except its name?
Today the story goes Dardanian Rome is growing and, close beside the Tiber, which rises in the Apennines, building an immense foundation to provide support for mighty things. And with this kind of growth the city’s shape is changing. The day will come when Rome will be the head of the whole world!
That, so people say, is what the seers predict, and those oracles which foretell our fate.
As I remember, when the Trojan state was facing ruin and Aeneas was in tears, anxious about the safety of his race, Helenus, a son of Priam, said to him:

‘Child of Venus, if you will take good note of what I prophesy, while you are safe Troy will not fall completely! Fire and sword will offer you a path, and you will go, taking with you our plundered Pergamum, until you reach a foreign place kinder to you than your own native land of Troy. Even now I see a city destined for Phrygian posterity, a town so mighty nothing like it now exists or will exist, or has been seen before, in earlier years. Through long centuries other leading men will make it powerful, but one man born from blood of Iülus will make that city mistress of the world. And when that leader’s time on earth is done, aetherial realms will welcome him with joy and heaven will be his final dwelling place.’

My mind recalls how Helenus prophesied these matters to Aeneas, who carried ancestral gods away from Troy. My heart rejoices that city walls are rising for his posterity, and I am pleased the Greek defeat of Troy has led to this, such a benefit to Trojans.

But now, I must not wander too far off my course and let my horses lose sight of the goal. The heavens and everything below them change their form. So does the earth, as well, and all things it contains. We mortals, too, part of the universe, are not mere flesh, but souls with wings, and thus we can create a home inside the bodies of wild beasts or settle in the hearts of our own cattle. And therefore, we should allow those bodies which could well contain the souls of parents, brothers, or others linked to us somehow, or human beings, at least, to rest safe and undisturbed and not cram our stomachs with food fit for Thyestes’ dinner feast.¹ How those men get used to evil actions and, in their impiety, prepare themselves for spilling human blood, when with their knives they slit a young calf’s throat and, quite unmoved, hear its mournful bleats, or slaughter a young goat, which cries out like a child, or feed on birds which they themselves have fed. When they do this, how close are they to acting out real crimes? Where do such actions lead?

Let oxen plough or perish from old age. Let sheep provide protection from the freezing northern winds, let well-fed she goats offer us their udders for our hands to milk. Throw your nets away, your traps and snares and your deceptive tricks. Do not use twigs and lime to fool the birds, or scare deer into nets with feathered rope, or hide barbed hooks inside deceiving bait. Destroy what injures you, but even then do nothing more than kill. Make sure your mouths abstain from blood and eat more wholesome food!”

The story goes that when his mind had learned these and other teachings of Pythagoras, Numa went back to his native city, and there, by popular request, took up the reins of power and ruled in Latium. Blessed with his wife Egeria, a nymph, and guided by the Muses, he brought in sacrificial rites and trained his people, who were familiar with ferocious war, in the arts of peace. When, in ripe old age, his life and reign were over, everyone—Latian matrons, senators, and citizens—all mourned the death of Numa. But his wife moved from the city and hid herself away in the dense valley forests of Aricia, and there, with her groans and lamentations, kept interfering with the sacred rites worshipping Diana, which Orestes first introduced into those wooded groves.¹ O, how often the nymphs of lakes and trees advised her to be quiet and spoke words of consolation! And Hippolytus, brave son of Theseus, would say to her, as she continued weeping:

¹Atreus, father of Agamemnon, invited his brother, Thyestes, to a banquet of reconciliation, where he served Thyestes the cooked flesh of his own children.

"You must stop. You are not the only one whose fortunes are a cause for grief. Consider others who have gone through similar disasters, and you will find yours easier to bear. I wish I knew examples of such sorrow, apart from mine, which could relieve your pain. But even mine can help.

Perhaps your ears have picked up stories of Hippolytus—how he met his death because his father was so credulous and his stepmother so evil and deceitful. You will find my words astonishing—it will be hard for me to prove the things I say. But still, I am Hippolytus. Some time ago, Phaedra, the daughter of Pasiphaë, tried to seduce me into dishonouring my father’s bed.² When she did not succeed, she accused me of the criminal act she herself desired (she may have done that more through fear of being found out herself than through her rage at being rejected). So I was charged. Though I was innocent, my father ordered me to leave the city and, as I left, rained down hostile curses on my head. I went off into exile ¹According to some Greek and Latin traditions, Orestes, Agamemnon’s son, had brought the worship of Diana/Artemis from Taurus into Italy and set up a shrine in Aricia.

²Pasiphaë was the wife of Minos, king of Crete. She was notorious for having sex with a bull and giving birth to the Minotaur. See above 8.212 ff.
in my chariot, intending to reside in Troezen, a city ruled by Pittheus.
While I was moving past the shore near Corinth, the sea rose up. A huge amount of water seemed to curl and grow into a mountain which bellowed and, at the very summit, shot up spray. Then that seething mass of sea spat out a bull with horns. It just stood there, in the gentle breezes, chest above the waves,
its gaping mouth and nostrils vomiting great quantities of sea. My companions felt terror fill their hearts, but I remained quite unafraid, my mind preoccupied with thoughts of exile. But my fierce horses turned their necks towards the sea and trembled, ears erect. Frightened by that monstrous bull, they panicked and dragged the chariot down the rocks.
My hands tried hard to gain control but failed.
I pulled the reins, now white with flecks of foam,
and leaned out backwards to take up the slack.
I might have reined those maddened horses in,
but one of the wheels collided with a stump,
right on the axle hub where it spins round.
The wheel broke off and shattered. I was tossed clear of the chariot, my arms entangled in the reins. My living flesh was torn away, while my body was still skewered on the wood.
Some of my limbs were pulled right out, and some stayed on the stump. With a loud snapping noise, my bones broke off. You could have seen me there, totally done in, breathing out my life,
with no part left which you could recognize,
and every part a single giant wound.
Now, nymph, can you or dare you still compare your tragedy with mine?

I also saw
that kingdom where there is no light and bathed my mangled body in Phlegethon’s stream.
My life would not have been restored to me without the power of healing potions from Aesculapius, Apollo’s son.
Thanks to his potent herbs and Paean’s help,
I came alive once more, although this act

HIPPOLYTUS AND DIANA
made Pluto angry. So Diana cast dense fog around me, in case my presence increased the rage he felt about my gift.¹
To keep me safe and away from danger when I was visible, the goddess added years to my age and changed the way I look,
so I would not be known to anyone.
Then, for a long time Diana wondered whether she should make my home in Delos or in Crete but in the end rejected both and placed me here. She also ordered me to cast aside my name, which could arouse ideas about the horses I had owned.

‘You, who used to be Hippolytus once, must now be Virbius!’²

From that time on,
I have lived as one of the minor gods within this grove, where I remain concealed under the sacred power of Diana, my mistress, to whom I am now linked.”

But disasters other people suffered could not relieve Egeria’s discontent.
At the foot of a mountain she lay down, dissolving in her tears, until Diana,
moved by Egeria’s loyal sorrow, transformed her body to an icy spring
and made her limbs an ever-flowing stream.

This remarkable event amazed the nymphs.
Hippolytus, too, an Amazon’s son,
was no less astonished than that ploughman in Tyrrenian fields when he first observed a fateful lump of earth begin to move,
all on its own, with no one touching it.
The clod soon lost its earth-like form and changed so it looked like a man. Its new-formed mouth then opened to reveal man’s future fate.
The natives called him Tages, the first one

¹Paean is a common name for Apollo.
²The first part of Hippolytus’s name comes from the Greek word for horse.
to teach Etruscan people to foresee what was to come.

And Romulus, as well, was equally surprised when he once saw his spear sticking in the Palatine hill suddenly sprout leaves and stand fixed in place, held there by new roots, not by its iron point which he had driven in the ground, for now his weapon had become a hardy willow, offering those who looked on in amazement its unexpected shade.

Praetor Cipus was astonished, too, when he saw his face reflected in the waters of a stream, for he saw he had grown horns. ‘At first, thinking the image was a mere illusion, he touched his forehead, then touched it again. His fingers felt the horns which he had seen. Now he could no longer blame his eyesight. At that moment, he was on the march back home, having prevailed against his enemies. So he stopped, raised his eyes up to the sky, stretched his arms out in the same direction, and cried:

“O you gods in heaven above, no matter what this omen indicates, if it is auspicious, may it benefit my native land and Quirinus’ people, but if disaster threatens, let that be for me alone.”

He built a grassy altar of green turf and sought to appease the gods with burning fires of incense. He offered bowls of wine and had the trembling organs of slaughtered sheep inspected to find out what they might indicate about his future. Once the Etruscan seer peered into them, he saw at once the signs of something great,

---

1 The Praetors were important civic officials and military leaders in Rome.
though not yet clear. But when his watchful eyes glanced upward from the entrails of the sheep and saw the horns on Cipus, he cried out:

“Hail to you, O king! For to you, Cipus, and your horns this place and every citadel in Latium will pledge obedience. But you must not delay. With all speed you must go in the open city gates. So Fate commands. For once the people there have welcomed you, you will become their king and safely hold the everlasting throne.”

Cipus stepped back. Turning his stern features from the city walls, he said:

“May the gods drive all such prophecies a long way off—far, far away! It would be much better to spend my life in exile than to have the Capitol see me enthroned as king.”

He said this and immediately summoned the people and distinguished senators to an assembly. But first he wrapped his horns with laurel symbolizing peace, then stood upon a mound raised by his brave soldiers, offered up prayers to the ancient gods, as was their custom, and said:

“With us here there is a man who will become our king, unless you expel him from the city. I will not name him, but I will tell you a sign that indicates just who he is. On his forehead he has horns! The seer predicts that if this man comes into Rome the laws he makes will turn you into slaves. He could have entered through the open gates, but I prevented him, despite the fact

---

1 In Ovid’s time the Roman state was still officially a republic and the notion of a having a king was repugnant. Although Augustus was de facto emperor, he was careful to maintain many of the outward trappings of republican Rome.
that no one is more closely linked to him than me. Romans, you must make sure this man stays outside the city. If he deserves it, bind him in heavy chains or end all fear
by sending the destined tyrant to his death.”

There was a murmur from the crowd, like the sound of lofty pines trees when raging East Wind whistles through their leaves or like ocean waves when heard from far away. Amid the sounds of that confused and noisy crowd, one voice cried out:

“Which one is he?”

Those in the crowd
looked at each other’s foreheads, trying to find the horns he had predicted would be there.
Then Cipus addressed the crowd once more:

“That man you’re looking for—you’ll find him here.”

Then he removed the wreath around his head, though some men tried to stop him, and displayed
the two horns clearly growing from his head.
The whole crowd groaned and lowered its eyes.
Who could believe that people would not wish to gaze at such a famous and deserving head?
No longer able to watch him standing there without a tribute to his honour, they placed a festive garland on his head. And then, Cipus, since you were not allowed to pass inside the city walls, they honoured you with land, as much as you could move around from dawn to sunset, with a team of oxen harnessed to the plough, and on bronze pillars by the city gates they carved a pair of horns, a lasting symbol of that miracle which would remain through ages yet to come.

And now, you Muses, divine presences who attend on poets, since you know the past and vast extents of time cannot mislead you, reveal to us where Aesculapius, the son of Coronis, came from and why that island which deep Tiber flows around made him a part of sacred rituals in Romulus’s Rome.

Once, long ago,
a foul disease infected Latian air,
and people’s pallid bodies were destroyed
by a sickness which siphoned off their blood.
When they realized, after so much death,
that human efforts were of no avail
and their healing skills were ineffectual, they looked to the heavenly gods for help, travelling to the centre of the world,
the oracle of Phoebus built in Delphi, praying to the god for his assistance in their distress, asking for some remedy to make them healthy once again and end
the evils plaguing so great a city.
The ground, the laurel tree, and the quivers belonging to the god himself, trembled, all together, and from the deepest place within the shrine, the tripod spoke these words and shook their fearful hearts:1

“What you seek here,
Roman, you might have looked for in a place nearer where you live. Now go and seek it closer to your home. The help you ask for will not come from Apollo but his son.
The omens are propitious, so go now and summon Aesculapius to help.”2

The prudent Senate heard the god’s command, then, in their deliberations, inquired about Apollo’s youthful son, to learn the city where he lived, and sent out men to follow the winds to Epidaurus.3
As soon as their curved ship had touched the shore,
the men who had been sent at once approached

---

1 The priestess who uttered the response sat on a tripod deep inside the shrine of Apollo.
2 Aesculapius was the son of Apollo and Coronis. For details of his birth, see 2.929 above.
3 Epidaurus is a city in the Peloponnese.
the elder statesmen in the Grecian council and urged the Greeks to let them have the god who by his presence might end the disease which was destroying people in Ausonia,

for that was what Apollo's oracle,

the voice of truth, had said. Among the Greeks, the various opinions were divided.

Some believed they should not withhold their help,

but most men argued they should keep the god and not give up what now belonged to them, or let other men sail off with their own gods.

While this debate wore on, as the evening pushed away the waning light and darkness covered earth in shadows, the Roman envoy, fast asleep, seemed to see the healing god standing beside his bed. In his left hand

he gripped a rustic staff, while with his right

he stroked his lengthy beard, the way he looks in his own temple. The words he uttered were full of reassurance:

“Do not fear.

I will leave my images here and come.

Gaze upon this serpent folding itself around my staff and note the features well, so you can recognize it. I will change into this serpent, but in a larger form and look as huge as celestial bodies should be when they change their shape.”

His voice stopped,

and, when it did, the vision disappeared.

With them sleep fled, as well, and, as it went,

the gentle light of day arrived. Once dawn had scattered fiery stars, the civic leaders, still unsure what they should do, assembled at the splendid temple of the very god

the Romans wished to take, prayed to him, and asked him for some heavenly signal to indicate where he might wish to live.

They had barely finished praying when the god,

a golden serpent with its crest erect,

gave out a hiss to announce his presence,

and, as he entered, made his statue shake, as well as altars, doors, marble paving stones, and gilded pediments in the temple roof.

He halted in the middle of the shrine, reared up chest high and gazed around the crowd, eyes flashing fire. The people gathered there were paralyzed with terror, but the priest, a white band holding down his sacred locks, recognized the presence of the god and cried:

“It is the god! Behold the god! Let all those present keep pure tongues and minds. Most beautiful one, may we look on you and prosper, and may you help all people who observe your sacred rites!”

Those in the shrine adored the god as the priest had ordered, echoing his words. And the Romans there with voice and heart showed reverent respect. The god nodded and, as he moved his crest, confirmed his favour with a triple hiss and a flickering tongue, then glided down the gleaming stairs. About to move away, he turned his head for one long final look at his ancient altars and nodded farewell to the familiar sanctuary and shrine which had been his home. Then the huge serpent moved away, slithering across the ground now strewn with flowers, winding his coils, gliding through the middle of the city, to the crescent spit around the harbour. Here he stopped and with a calm expression seemed to dismiss the crowd of worshippers who dutifully followed in his train. Then his body moved into the Roman ship, which felt the heavenly load, as his weight forced it to settle further in the sea. Aeneas’ descendants were overjoyed. They sacrificed a bull beside the shore, then loosed the twisted cables on their ship, all wreathed in garlands, and gentle breezes pushed the vessel through the sea. Arching up, the god placed his neck on the curving stern, pressing it down, and gazed at the azure waves. Fair winds blew him across the Ionian Sea and, as Aurora rose on the sixth day, the god arrived in Italy, passing Lacinium’s coast, with Juno’s famous shrine, and Scylaceum’s coast, then sailing on past Iapygia, rowing around the rocks of Amphrisia on his left, while passing steep Cocinthia on the right, then moving by Romethium, Caulon, and Narycia, through Pelorus’ strait in Sicily, then past the dwelling place of Aeolus and mines of Temese, moving by Leucosia and Paestum, with fields of roses. He sailed past Capri, Minerva’s headland, the fertile vineyards on Surrentum’s hills, Herculaneum, Stabiae, and Parthenope, a place created for idleness and leisure, past the Sibyl’s shrine at Cumae, and from there to Baiae’s thermal pools and Liternum, with rows of mastic trees, Volturnus’ stream, whose waters bear huge quantities of sand, and Sinuessa, where the white doves fly, Minturnae’s marshes, full of pestilence, Caieta, whose name comes from the nurse Aeneas buried there, and then the home of Antiphates, and swampy Trachas, to Circe’s land and Antium’s firm shore. The sailors steered their ship, still under sail, towards the beach, for the sea was restless. The god unwound his coils, fold after fold, and his huge arching body glided away towards his father’s temple close to shore. Then, once the seas grew calm again, the god from Epidaurus left Apollo’s shrine, where his own father’s hospitality had brought him joy, dragging his raspy scales and ploughing furrows in the sandy ground, climbed on board by sliding up the rudder, and settled his head on the lofty stern.

1The names here refer to coastal towns in southern Italy. Ovid is again describing a voyage around the toe of Italy, through the Strait of Messina, and up the west coast towards Rome.
There he stayed until the ship reached Castrum and Lavinium’s sacred shrines and sailed to where the Tiber’s waters meet the sea. All the people from every side rushed down to meet the god, hordes of men and women, along with those who tend your sacred fires, O Trojan Vesta. Every person there hailed the god with shouts of joy. As the swift ship made its way upstream, crackling incense burned on rows of altars on both riverbanks, filling the scented air with perfumed smoke, while sacrificial knives grew hot with blood of slaughtered victims.

The god now entered Rome, capital of the world. The snake reared up, set his head on the summit of the mast, and turned his neck, searching out a place suitable for him to live. Where Tiber splits into two streams flowing past a spot they call the Island, with both arms branching equally on either side, surrounding dry land in the middle, the serpent god, a child of Phoebus, left the Latian ship, resumed the form of his divinity, and ended all their grief, for he came there as one who would restore the city’s health.

The god Asclepius was a foreigner who came into our shrines from far away. But Caesar is a god in his own city, a man preeminent in peace and war. Still, it was not the battles that he fought and finished with triumphant victories, or his achievements in affairs at home, or the speed with which he won such glory, that changed him to a brand new heavenly star with a fiery tail, but rather his own son, for of all great Caesar’s deeds, the greatest one was that he was the father of this man,

---

'The Vestal Virgins were important traditional religious figures in Rome, in charge of tending a sacred fire which was not allowed to go out and of looking after ancestral relics thought to have been brought to Rome from Troy.
Augustus Caesar. Yes, he overcame that British race surrounded by the sea, steered his victorious ships up seven mouths of the papyrus-bearing river Nile, compelled those rebels in Numidia to follow Rome, along with Juba, too, from Cinyps, and Pontus, swollen with pride to hear the very name of Mithridates, earned many triumphs, and enjoyed a few. But surely all these feats cannot compare with being the father of a man so great? With him in charge of our affairs, you gods have shown great favour to the human race! Thus, to make sure Augustus was not born from mortal seed, Caesar had to be divine. When the golden mother of Aeneas thought of this and saw men were preparing an armed conspiracy to bring about the tragic death of Caesar, she grew pale and kept repeating to every god she met:

“Look at how they hatch their plots against me, using every kind of fraud to take the life of the only man who is still left for me of those who come from Trojan Iulus. Am I to be the only one who cares about these troubles, which are all too real and come up all the time? I was the one wounded by that Calydonian spear of Diomede. Then the walls of Troy and the wretched way they were defended brought me grief. I saw my son Aeneas driven out to wander far and wide, tossed by the sea, moving to the silent realm of shadows, and waging war with Turnus,

---

1 Julius Caesar was not the biological father of Octavius (later called Augustus), but his great uncle. In his will he adopted Octavius and made him his heir. Octavius fought on Caesar’s behalf during the civil wars and, after Caesar’s assassination, continued the struggle, finally emerging victorious in 31 BC. He went on to become the first of the Roman emperors and changed his name to Augustus.

2 Juba was king of Mauritania, in northwest Africa. He and the Numidians had supported Caesar’s political opponents in Rome and were conquered. Caesar defeated the son of Mithridates, a famous king of Pontus, beside the Black Sea. A triumph was a large celebratory procession in Rome to mark an important military victory and was considered a rare honour.

3 Iulus (also called Ascanius) was the son of Aeneas. The mother of Aeneas is Venus.
or rather, if I speak the truth, with Juno.
Why remember now the ancient sufferings my family went through? This present fear inhibits all my thoughts of earlier days.
You see those lethal knives being sharpened!
Stop those men, I beg you. Prevent their crime.
Do not let them extinguish Vesta’s flame with the blood of her own priest.”

With words like these,
Venus spoke about her anxious worries throughout the heavens, but without success.
Gods were sympathetic, but could not break the ancient sisters’ iron rules of Fate.¹ Still, they did give unambiguous signs of future sorrow. Men talk of weapons clashing high among black clouds, fearful blasts from horns and trumpets pealing in the sky, warnings in advance of the disaster.
The visage of the sun grew dark, as well,
and cast a pale light down on troubled earth.
People could often see torches blazing in the middle of the stars, and often drops of blood fell from the clouds. Lucifer grew dim with rusty dark spots on his face,
the chariot of the moon had flecks of blood.
The Stygian screech owl shrieked mournful cries
in a thousand spots, an ominous warning.
In a thousand places, ivory busts wept tears of sorrow, and, so men maintain, chants were heard in sacred groves and with them words of caution, No sacrifice revealed a welcome omen. The inner organs warned a major conflict was in store. They found, among the entrails, livers with the top part sliced away. In the forum, by men’s homes, and near the temples of the gods, dogs howled all night and, so they say, the silent dead roamed everywhere, while tremors shook the city.
But still, no omens from the gods could halt
the treacherous act or what Fate had in store.

¹Julius Caesar, at the time of his death, held an important position as a priest in Rome.
²The ancient sisters are the three Fates.
Drawn swords were carried to the sacred house, for no place in the city pleased those men for their foul murder except the Senate. Then Venus struck her breast with both her hands and tried to hide that offspring of Aeneas in a cloud which earlier had hidden Paris, when she snatched him away from Menelaus, the warlike son of Atreus, the same cloud which had hidden Aeneas when he escaped the sword of Diomedes.¹

Jupiter, her father, then said to Venus:

“My child, are you attempting on your own to change immutable Fate? You are permitted, as a goddess, to go inside the house where those three sisters live. There you will see huge tablets made of solid brass and iron where everything is clearly written down. These have no fear of heavenly thunder, or lightning’s rage, or any form of harm, for they are safe throughout eternity. You will find the fates of your descendants inscribed in everlasting adamant. I myself have read them and remember. And to ensure that you no longer stay quite ignorant of what the future holds, I will repeat them now.

This man Caesar, for whom you are so anxious, Cytherea, has lived out his time. The years allotted to his life on earth are over. Now you, together with his son, heir to his name, will make sure great Caesar reaches heaven as a god and his people worship him. And Caesar’s son, all by himself, will bear the heavy burden placed upon his back. We will be with him when he goes to war and seeks with utmost courage to avenge his father's death. Under his leadership, the walls of Mutina will be besieged, and fall, and sue for peace. Pharsalia will come to know him well, and Philippi will twice be soaked in Macedonian blood. Pompey's famous name will be defeated in Sicilian seas, and Cleopatra, a Roman general's Egyptian wife, will place mistaken trust in marriage ties, and fall, and render empty all her threats that our own Capitol would be enslaved by her Canopus. But there is no need for me to list barbarian races and nations placed beside both ocean shores. He will control all habitable lands and will be master even of the sea. Once countries are at peace, his mind will turn to civil affairs, and he will prove himself a most just legislator through the laws he will enact. By his own example he will guide our morals, and with an eye on future ages and generations as yet unborn, he will order a child born from his blessed consort, to take up his own name and, with it, all his duties. He will not come to his celestial home and kindred stars, until, in his old age, his years will rival those of ancient Nestor. In the meantime, take out Caesar's spirit from his murdered corpse. Change it to a star, so from his seat high in the sky, Julius, 1Mutina was a place in Gaul where Octavius won a battle against his major rival, Antony. Pharsalia in Thessaly was the site of a battle where Julius Caesar defeated his main rival, Pompey, and Philippi in Thrace was the site of a battle where Antony and Octavius defeated Brutus and Cassius, the main conspirators in the plot to murder Julius Caesar. Ovid treats the two famous battle sites as the same place. Pompey's son was defeated at sea near Sicily. The Roman general who married Cleopatra was Antony, who had been married to Octavius's sister. Canopus was a city in Egypt. Octavius defeated Antony and Cleopatra at the Battle of Actium in 31 BC, a victory which brought the civil wars to an end and left him in complete control of political affairs in Rome.

¹These two moments, when Venus rescues Trojan warriors from their battlefield opponents by hiding them in a cloud, are part of Homer’s Iliad.

2Augustus took Livia Drusilla as his wife (who was married and pregnant at the time), and later adopted her son, Tiberius, and made him his successor.

3Nestor, king of Pylos, was famous for living a long time. There are some editorial difficulties with the Latin in this line.
now transformed into a god, may gaze down upon our forum and our Capitol.”

Jupiter had hardly finished speaking when gentle Venus, invisible to all, stood in the centre of the Senate house, snatched away the soul from Caesar’s body, now it had been freed, thus preventing it from scattering in the air, and took it up to the heavenly stars. As she moved, she felt the soul catch fire and start to blaze. She hurled it from her bosom, and it flew high above the moon, dragging in its train a tail of fire. Now a glittering star, Caesar looks down at his son’s splendid deeds, confesses they are greater than his own, and derives great joy from being surpassed. And though the son forbids men to maintain his exploits should be praised more than his father’s, nevertheless, when people talk, his fame, which in its freedom follows no commands, prefers the son, even against his will, and in this one matter disobeys him. In the same way, mighty Atreus yields his claim to glory to Agamemnon, Theseus is greater than Aegus, Achilles so much more than Peleus, and finally, to offer an example worthy of both Caesars, father Saturn is a lesser god than Jupiter, his son. For Jupiter commands the citadels high in celestial space and every realm of the three-fold universe. Augustus governs lands below. Each is a ruler and a father, too. I pray to you gods who accompanied Aeneas, for whom sword and fire gave way, to our native gods, to Quirinus, founder of our city, to Mars, father of unconquered Romulus, to Vesta, worshipped with the household gods of Caesar, and along with Caesar’s Vesta, you too, Phoebus, living here among us, and Jupiter, who from on high occupies the fortress of Tarpeia, and other gods, all the ones a poet is permitted with piety and justice to invoke,
I beg you—let that day be slow to come,
postponed to well beyond our generation,
when Augustus will leave the world he rules and move up to the heavens and, once gone, will grant his favours to all those who pray.

My task is now complete. Here I end my work, which neither Jupiter’s rage, nor fire, nor sword,
nor gnawing time can ever wipe away.
Let that day which brings my tenuous life to its allotted end come when it will,
its power will only kill my body.
The finer part of me will be borne up,
as an immortal, beyond the lofty stars,
and my name will never be forgotten.
Wherever the power of Rome extends throughout the nations it has overcome, I will be read. Men will celebrate my fame for all the ages, and, if there is truth in poet’s prophecies, I will live on.
Glossary and Index

List of Names and Places

The following list contains the more important names in Ovid’s text. The numbers refer to the relevant book and line in the English text. The list normally includes only those references where we learn something about the name. Material in the footnotes or chapter summaries is not listed in the index. Where a name is mentioned several times in a short space, the reference indicates that with the letters ff. (e.g., 2.342 ff.), rather than listing each separate occurrence of the name.

As a guide to pronunciation, the spelling of each name includes spaces to indicate the syllabification and an accent to show where the stress falls. Opinions about pronunciation of Classical names sometimes differ. The following comments should clarify some of the practices I have followed.¹

The letters –eus at the end of a name are almost always two syllables: (e.g., Orpheus is pronounced Or-pha-eus, Pentheus is pronounced Pén-the-us, and so on). The same rule holds for those names ending in –aus (e.g., Menelaus—Men-e-lá-us).

Final vowels are pronounced by themselves, as in Calliope and Penelope (each four syllables) or Achaea, Hecate, and Cybele (each three syllables), although there are several exceptions, usually when the name has become quite familiar in English (e.g., Crete, Palatine, Rome, Ganymede, Nile, Palestine, Sabine, and so on). Where these exceptions occur I have placed (E) after the name, to indicate that the name is pronounced as it is in English.

In the text, a vowel with a diaeresis placed above it is pronounced in a separate syllable (for example, Caicus, Danaë, and Phaëton all have three syllables). The names in the list do not include the dieresis, since the syllables are indicated with spaces.

A-Chaë-a: a region in the northern Peloponnese, also used for Greece generally—(Teiresias) 3.780; (worships Bacchus) 4.900; 5.487; (Arethusa) 5.900; (Achaeans cheer Jason) 7.234; (Mino) 7.790; (Theseus) 8.428; (drowned cities) 15.439.

Ach-ae-men-i-des: one of Ulysses’ comrades—(his story) 14.252 ff.

A-chi-lës: son of Peleus and Thetis—8.490; (conceived) 11.418; (fights Cynus) 12.112 ff.; (Menoëtes) 12.178 ff.; (sacrifices to Pallas and feasts) 12.238 ff.; (Nestor) 12.278; (Neptune ¹My guide to pronunciation in most cases has been John Walker, A Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper Names (London 1830).

Â·COÊ·TES: a Tyrrenian worshipper of Bacchus: (his story) 3.878 ff.

Â·CRÎS’-Î-US: king of Argos, father of Danaë, grandfather of Perseus—(denies Bacchus) 3.852, 4.901; 4.911; (Perseus) 5.376.

Â·TAË·ON: son of Autonoë, grandson of Cadmus—(sees Diana) 3.210 ff.; (killed) 3.342 ff.; 3.1095.

Â·DÔ·NIS: son of Myrrha and Cinyras—(birth) 10.772 ff.; (Venus) 10.795 ff.; (dies) 10.1086; (transformed) 10.1109.

AÊ·A·CUS: son of Jupiter and Aegina, king of Aegina, father of Telamon and Peleus—7.743; (Minos) 7.749 ff.; (Cephalus) 7.793 ff.; (describes the plague) 7.810 ff.; 7.1356; (in old age) 9.698, 706; 13.39.

Aê·È·TES: king of Colchis, father of Medea—(Jason) 7.12 ff., 7.172; 7.281.

Aë·GÈ·US: king of Athens, father of Theseus—(Medea) 7.637; (Theseus) 7.663 ff.; (Minos) 7.713; 15.1301.

Aë·GÎ·NA: a nymph, daughter of Asopus, also an island in the Saronic Gulf—(in Arachne’s tapestry) 6.183; (Minos) 7.744 ff.; (Cephalus) 7.769; (plague) 7.811 ff.; (Jupiter) 7.958.

Aë·Î·US: god of the winds—(confines Boreas) 1.384; (Tisiphone) 4.718; (confines winds) 4.981; (incest of children) 9.818; 11.681; (Ceyx) 11.872; 11.1140; (Aeneas) 14.131; (Macareus) 14.343 ff.; (Aesculapius) 15.1071.

Aë·S·A·CUS: son of Priam and Alexirhoë—(his story) 11.1146 ff.; (birth) 11.1160; (Hesperie) 11.1164 ff.; (transformed) 11.1196 ff.; (mourned) 12.1.
AESCUŁAPUS: son of Coronis and Apollo—(birth) 2.929; (Ocyrhoe) 2.950 ff.; (Hippolytus) 15.802; (journey to Rome as a god) 15.943 ff.

AÉTNA: a volcano in Sicily—(on fire) 2.319; (prison of the winds) 4.982; (holds down Typhoeus) 5.559; (Ceres) 5.688; (Daedalus) 8.416; (Telemus) 13.1222; (Polyphemus) 13.1360, 13.1376; 14.2; 14.253; (Polyphemus) 14.293; (Pythagoras) 15.512 ff.

AGÉNOR: father of Europa and Cadmus—2.1274; 3.4; (Juno’s hatred) 3.383; 3.471.

AGLAUROS: daughter of Cecrops—(Erichthonius and Pallas) 2.826; (Mercury) 2.1102 ff.; 2.1171; (Envy) 2.1187 ff.; (transformed) 2.1218.

ÁJAX (1): son of Telamon—(Hyacinthus) 10.311; (arms of Achilles) 12.1060; (presents his case) 13.3 ff.; (his ancestry) 13.34; (saves Ulysses) 13.120 ff.; (exploits against the Trojans) 13.134 ff.; (insulted by Ulysses) 13.221 ff.; (invulnerable) 13.441; (kills himself) 13.631 ff.

ALCITHÆA: daughter of Minyas—(denies Bacchus) 4.1 ff.; (tells story) 4.401 ff.; (transformed) 4.595.

ALCÝONE: daughter of Aeolus, wife of Ceyx—7.635; 11.607; (Ceyx) 11.659 ff.; 11.845; 11.874; 11.881; 11.891; (Juno) 11.907; (with Morpheus) 11.1005 ff.; (laments) 11.1036 ff.; (finds Ceyx’s corpse and is transformed) 11.1092 ff.; 11.1138.

ALPHÉUS: a river god and river near Elis in the Peloponnese—(boils) 2.361; (Arethusa) 5.758, 5.934 ff., 5.968 ff.

ALTHAÉA: daughter of Thestius, wife of Oeneus, mother of Meleager—(revenge against Meleager) 8.699 ff.; (kills herself) 8.831.

AMPHION: son of Jupiter, husband of Niobe, king of Thebes—(music) 6.298; (sons) 6.370 ff.; (kills himself) 6.444; 15.636.

GLOSSARY AND INDEX

AN’DRŎM’E-DĂ: daughter of Cepheus and Cassiope—(saved by Perseus) 4.994 ff.; 4.1127.

ÁN’DRŎS: son of Anius, also an island ruled by him—(Minos) 7.738; 13.1037 ff.; (gives in to Greeks) 13.1054; 13.1061.

A’PŎL’ĭ-O: divine son of Jupiter and Latona, twin brother of Diana, also called Phoebus and Paean, god of the sun—(kills Python) 1.643 ff.; (loves Daphne) 1.659 ff.; (Cupid) 1.661 ff.; (chases Daphne) 1.706 ff.; (laurel tree) 1.813 ff.; (Phaëton’s concerns) 1.1108 ff.; (palace of the Sun) 2.1 ff.; (Phaëton’s request) 2.31 ff.; (grieves) 2.477 ff., 2.550 ff.; (Raven and Coronis) 2.801, 2.889 ff.; (Aesculapius and Chiron) 2.929; (cattle stolen) 2.1006 ff.; (Cadmus) 3.15; (Venus and Mars) 4.246 ff.; (Leucothoe) 4.280 ff.; (Typhoon) 5.523; (in Arachne’s weaving) 6.200; 6.269; (Latona) 6.344 ff.; (Niobe’s sons) 6.365 ff.; (Marsyas) 6.626 ff.; 7.617; (Rhodes) 7.578; (Cephus) 7.617; (walls of Megara) 8.24; 8.48; (Mopsus) 8.556; (Dryope) 9.532; (Cypris) 10.196 ff.; (Hyacinth) 10.243 ff.; (Orpheus’ head) 11.87; (Pan) 11.237 ff.; (punishes Midas) 11.266; (with Laomedon at Troy) 11.294 ff.; (Chione) 11.479 ff.; (Daedalion) 11.539; 11.921; (kills Achilles) 12.901 ff.; 13.670; 13.812; (Delos) 13.1011; (Andros) 13.1039; (Ambracia) 13.1139; (Sibyl) 14.206 ff.; 15.803; 15.969; 15.983; 15.1094.

A’RĂCH’Ĭ-Ĕ: a girl from Lydia—(her weaving) 6.9 ff.; (Minerva) 6.37 ff.; (tapestry) 6.166 ff.; (transformed) 6.214 ff.; (Niobe) 6.247.

A’RĂ-CĂ’Ĭ-DĬ-Ĭ: region in the central Peloponnese—(Lycaon) 1.312; (Syriphon) 1.1018; (Callisto) 2.590; (dogs) 3.313; (Ancaeus) 8.616; (the boar) 9.312; (Pythagoras) 15.499.

ÁR’CĂS: son of Callisto and Jupiter—(birth) 2.689; (Callisto) 2.729 ff.; (transformed) 2.741.

A’Rĕ-Ĭ-Thŭ-Șă: a nymph from Elis living Sicily—5.640; (Ceres) 5.757 ff.; (her story) 5.892 ff.; (transformed) 5.961 ff.

ÁR’GŎ-NAUŤS: heroic crew of the Argo—6.1165; (voyage) 7.2; 7.17; (Jason) 7.189, 7.197; 15.508.

ÁR’GŎS: city and region in the Peloponnese—(Juno) 1.887; (dries out) 2.347; (shuts out Bacchus) 3.854; (Perseus enters) 5.374; (meeting of cities) 6.676; (fame of Theseus) 8.427; 15.247; (Erasinus) 15.412.

525
GLOSSARY AND INDEX

ÁR·GUS: a monster with a hundred eyes—(Juno and Io) 1.923 ff.; (Jupiter) 1.991 (Mercury) 1.1002 ff.; (killed) 1.1056 ff.; 2.788.

A·RÍ·ÁD·NE: daughter of Minos—(Theseus) 8.278 ff.; (Bacchus) 8.286.

AS·CÁL·A·PHUS: son of Orpheus and Acheron—(Proserpine) 5.841; (transformed) 5.849.

AS·CÁ·NI·US: son of Aeneas (also called IULUS)—(leaves Troy) 13.1004; (gift) 13.1083; (king) 14.930.

AT·Á·LÁN·TA (1): a girl from Tegea—(Boar Hunt) 8.502; (Meleager) 8.513 ff.; 8.600; (boar’s head) 8.674.

AT·Á·LÁN·TA (2): daughter of Schoeneus—10.848 ff.; (Hippomenes and the golden apples) 10.872 ff.; (transformed) 10.1060.

ÁTH·A·MAS: son of Aeolus, husband of Ino—(Penetheus) 3.861; (Niobe) 4.621; 4.692; 4.697; (Tisiphone) 4.722 ff.; (goes mad) 4.756 ff.

ÁTHENS: city in Attica—2.1064; (Envy) 2.1182; (Ceres) 5.1004; (Triptolemus) 5.1018; (in Minerva’s weaving) 6.117; (at war) 6.688, 6.699; (Tereus visits) 6.731; (Erectheus) 6.1103; 6.1153; (Medea) 7.632; (Theseus) 7.642; 7.762; (Cephalus) 7.770 ff.; 7.1131; (no tribute) 8.421; (Theseus) 8.858; (Eumolpus) 11.141; 15.635; 15.639.

ÁT·LÁS: giant son of Lapetus—2.429; (Perseus) 4.932 ff.; (transformed) 4.972; (daughters of Phorcys) 4.1150; (Niobe) 6.292; (Hercules) 9.439; (Pythagoras) 15.225.

AU·GÚS·TÜS: Roman emperor in Ovid’s time—1.286; 1.290; (gates) 1.827; (his greatness) 15.667; 15.1137 ff.; 15.1150; (achievements) 15.1242 ff.; 15.1293.

AU·RÓ·RA: goddess of the dawn—1.87; (Phaëton) 2.165; 2.210; 3.916; 4.933; 5.684; 6.82; 7.169; 7.339; (Cephalus) 7.1095 ff.; 7.1128; 7.1308; (complains) 9.672; 11.468; 11.926; (Mennon) 13.928 ff.; (Jupiter) 13.941 ff.; 13.994; 15.291; 15.1061.

AU·SÓ·NÍ·Á—a region in southern Italy, also Italy generally—13.1127; 14.496; 14.1187; 14.1209; 15.982.

AU·TÓ·NO·E: daughter of Cadmus, mother of Actaeon—3.295; (Penetheus) 3.1094.

A·VÉR·NÚS: place in Italy with access to the Underworld, also the Underworld generally—5.843; (Orpheus) 10.86; (Aeneas) 14.161 ff.

BÁC·CHUS: divine son of Jupiter and Semele, god of wine—(birth) 3.474; 3.485; (Thebes) 3.793 ff.; 3.807 ff.; 3.874; (with Acoetes) 3.925 ff.; 3.1071; 3.1114; (Alcithoë) 4.4; (tribute to)
Glossary and Index

4.17 ff.; 4.399; 4.576; (fame in Thebes) 4.612; 4.633; (Ino) 4.773; (fame) 4.898; (Acrisius) 4.904; 4.913; 4.1140; (Typhoëus) 5.524; (in Arachne's tapestry) 6.206; (Procne) 6.975; (Medea) 7.413; 7.462; (stolen bullock) 7.568; (Ariadne) 8.286; (Oeneus) 7.439; (avenges Orpheus) 11.100 ff.; (Tmolus and Silenus) 11.126 ff.; (Midas) 11.151 ff., 11.203 ff.; (Anius' daughters) 13.1041, 13.1065 ff.; (Pythagoras) 15.170, 15.616.

Baú-cis: wife of Philemon—(her story) 8.994 ff.; (transformed) 8.119.

Bear/Bears: constellation in the northern sky—2.193; 2.250; (Juno's anger) 2.777; 3.70; 3.910; 4.926; 8.334; 10.688; (on shield) 13.485; 13.1159.

Boe-ó-tia: region of central Greece—(dries up) 2.346; 3.23; 5.497; (Iolaüs) 8.492; (Hercules) 9.181; (Hippomenes) 10.891; (Aulis) 12.16; (Therses) 13.1086.

Bó-re-as: the North Wind—(moves north) 1.91; (locked) 1.383; (helps end the Flood) 1.478; 2.270; 5.453; (Orithyia) 6.112 ff.; (holds Greek fleet) 12.36; (urges fleet home) 13.683.

Bronze Age: 1.173.

Byb-lys: daughter of Cyane and Miletus, sister of Caunus—(born) 9.726; (her story) 9.727 ff.; (goes mad) 9.1014; (transformed) 9.1053.

Cad-mus: king of Thebes, son of Agenor—(founds Thebes) 3.5 ff.; (fights Serpent) 3.40 ff.; (sows Serpent's teeth) 3.140 ff.; (family troubles) 3.199 ff.; (Pentheus) 3.861; (Juno's hatred) 4.696; 4.809; (in exile) 4.835 ff.; (transformed) 4.857 ff.; (Niobe) 6.298.

Caé-sar: (Julius Caesar) a prominent Roman politician and general—1.286; (made a god) 15.1127 ff., (Jupiter) 15.1235 ff.; (star) 15.1282 ff.; 15.1304; 15.1316.

Caé-ťa: nurse of Aeneas and a place named after her—14.247; (buried) 14.674; 15.1084.

Cal-li-o-pe: one of the nine Muses, mother of Orpheus—(sings of Ceres) 5.538 ff.; 5.1034.

CÁL·LIS·TO: a nymph, daughter of Lycaon—(Jupiter) 2.595 ff.; (Diana) 2.648 ff.; (Arcas) 2.687; (transformed) 2.700 ff.; (sees Arcas) 2.735; (a constellation) 2.741; (Juno’s anger) 2.777.

CÁL·Y·DON: a city in Aetolia—6.678; (Theseus) 8.430; (Great Boar Hunt) 8.433 ff.; 8.776; (mourns Meleager) 8.823; 8.1140; 9.4; (Deianira) 9.241; (city in Italy) 14.783.

CÁ·PÍ·TOL: important hill in Rome—1.825; 2.795; 15.891; 15.1256; 15.1278.

CAS·SI·O·PE: mother of Andromeda, wife of Cepheus—4.996; 4.1025 ff.; 4.1095.

CÁS·TOR: son of Tyndareus and Leda, twin brother of Pollux—(Boar Hunt) 8.480, 8.587; 12.624.

CAÚ·CA·SUS: a mountain and a region around the Black Sea—(burns) 2.327; (Abaris) 5.138; (Hunger) 8.1239.

CÉN·TAURS: sons of Ixion, monsters with the head, arms, and torso of a human being and the body of a horse—(Chiron) 2.933 ff., 2.942; (Nessus) 9.164 ff.; 9.310; (Lapiths) 12.330 ff.; (Hercules) 12.835; 14.1025; 15.422.

CÉPH·A·LUS: husband of Procris—6.1110; (Aeacus) 7.773 ff.; 7.1038; (spear) 7.1047; (Procris) 7.1071 ff.; (Aurora) 7.1094 ff.; 7.1359; (Athens) 8.4.

CÉ·PHE·US: father of Andromeda—(Perseus) 4.993 ff.; 4.1095; (at feast) 5.20, 5.53, 5.73, 5.156.

CÉ·PHÍ·SUS: river in Phocis, father of Narcissus—(Deucalion) 1.536; (Cadmus) 3.31; (Lirope) 3.527; 7.616; (Theseus) 7.691.

CÉR·BE·RUS: three-headed dog guarding Hades—(Juno) 4.667; 4.739; (venom) 7.648; (taken by Hercules) 7.652; (Hercules) 9.302; 10.35; 10.104; 14.97.

CÉ·RES: sister of Jupiter, mother of Proserpine, goddess of the harvest and food generally—(Calliope) 5.543 ff.; 5.649; (Proserpine) 5.681 ff.; (transforms a boy) 5.704; (Cyane) 5.724 ff.; (punishes Sicily) 5.742 ff.; (Arethusa) 5.760 ff.; (Jupiter) 5.792 ff.; (Arethusa) 5.891 ff.; (Triptolemus) 5.1003; (Lyncus) 5.1031; (Neptune) 6.194; (Eleusis) 7.693; (Oeneus) 8.438; (Erysichthon) 8.1159 ff.; (Hunger) 8.1209 ff.; (lasion) 9.675; (festival) 10.664.

CH'I'MA'E-RA: a monster made of up different animals—6.554; 9.1032.

CH'I'O'NE: daughter of Daedalion—(with Mercury and Apollo) 11.475 ff.; (Autolycus) 11.493; (Philammon) 11.501; (Diana) 11.503 ff.

CH'I'RON: son of Saturn and Philyra, the most famous of the centaurs—(Aesculapius) 2.933; (Ocyrhoe) 2.938; (future life prophesied) 2.964; 2.1004; (Saturn) 6.209; 7.559.

CIC'ON'ES: a people of Thrace—6.1152; 10.3; (women attack Orpheus) 11.4 ff.; (punished by Bacchus) 11.104 ff.; (Pythagoras) 15.469.

CÍP'US: a Roman general—(his story) 15.850 ff.

CLÝM'E'NE: mother of Phaëton, wife of Merops—1.1117, 1130; 2.49, 2.58; (grieves for Phaëton) 2.482; (Heliades) 2.514 ff.; 4.298.

CLÝT'I'E: daughter of Oceanus—4.300; (her jealousy) 4.344; (transformed) 4.375 ff.

CÓR'INTH: city in the Isthmus between the Peloponnese and mainland Greece, also called Ephyre—2.348; 5.638; 6.680; (Medea) 7.621; (Hippolytus) 15.765.

CO'RÓ'NIS: a girl from Larissa, mother of Aesculapius—(Apollo) 2.800 ff.; (killed) 2.887 ff.

CRETE (E): large island in the Mediterranean—(Jupiter) 3.3; (dog) 3.309; (bull) 7.685; (Jupiter’s birthplace) 8.157; (Scylla) 8.188; (Minos) 8.243; (Daedalus) 8.297; (Cretan bull) 9.304; 9.1059; 9.1142; 9.1177; (Hymen) 10.1; 13.589; (Aeneas) 13.1124; 15.814.

CRÓ'TONA: city in southern Italy—(Numa) 15.12; (Hercules) 15.12 ff.; (founded) 15.88; (Pythagoras) 15.93.

CROW: daughter of Coroneus—(Raven) 2.807 ff.; (Minerva) 2.815 ff.; (transformed) 2.842 ff.

CÚ'MAE: a shrine on the coast of Italy—(Aeneas) 14.158, 14.242; 15.1078.
GLOSSARY AND INDEX

CUPID: son of Venus, god of love—(Apollo and Daphne) 1.662 ff., 1.689; 4.469; (Pluto) 5.578 ff.; (Medea) 7.126; 9.874; (Myrrha) 10.474; (Adonis) 10.792; (Venus) 10.805.

CY′A′NE: a nymph—(Pluto) 5.641 ff.; (transformed) 5.664; (Ceres) 5.724; (Miletus) 9.720.

CY′B′E′LE: Near Eastern mother of the gods—(Attis) 10.158; 10.1041; 10.1055; 10.1069; (Aeneas’ ships) 14.816 ff..

CY′C′NUS (1): son of Sthenelus—(grieves for Phaëton, is transformed) 2.530 ff.; 12.896.

CY′C′NUS (2): son of Hyrië and Apollo—(Philius) 7.589 ff.; (transformed) 7.601.

CY′L′A′RUS: a centaur—(his beauty) 12.612 ff.; (Hylome) 12.629; (killed) 12.653 ff.

CY′L′E′NE: mountain in Arcadia, associated with Mercury—1.310; 2.1075; 5.946; 7.612; 11.481.

CYTH′E′RÉ′A: another name for Venus

DAE′D′A′LI′ON: son of Lucifer, brother of Ceyx—(his story) 11.466 ff.; (transformed) 11.540 ff.

DÀ′NA′È: daughter of Acrisius, mother of Perseus—(Perseus) 4.908; (Jupiter) 4.1033; (in Arachne’s tapestry) 6.182; 11.179.

DÀ′PH′NÈ: daughter of Peneus—(Apollo) 1.660 ff.; (Peneus) 1.705; (transformed) 1.806 ff.

DEI′A′NÈ′RA: daughter of Oeneus, sister of Meleager, wife of Hercules—8.850; (fight over her) 9.13 ff.; (Nessus) 9.169 ff.; (Iole) 9.229 ff.; (sends shirt to Hercules) 9.250.

DÉL·PHI: important oracle in central Greece—1.758; 9.533; 10.251; 11.479; 11.657; 15.217; 15.956.

DEU·CÁ·LION: son of Prometheus, husband of Pyrrha: (survives the Flood) 1.463 ff.; (Themis) 1.532 ff.; (restores human life) 1.582 ff.

DI·Á·NA: divine daughter of Jupiter and Latona, twin sister of Apollo, also called PHOEBE—1.697; 1.711; 1.1027; (Callisto) 2.605; 2.621; 2.645 ff.; (Actaeon) 3.238 ff.; 3.372; 4.446; (fears Typhoëus) 5.525; 5.593; (Arêthusa) 5.963 ff., 5.993; (Latona) 6.269, 6.344 ff.; (Niobe) 6.472 ff.; 6.679; 7.1171; (Calypdonian Boar) 8.434 ff.; 8.559; (Meleager’s sisters) 8.847; 8.907; 9.147; 10.824; (Chione) 11.510; (at Aulis) 12.42 ff., 13.305; 14.514; 15.731; (Hippolytus) 15.805 ff.; (Egeria) 15.827.

DIS: an alternative name for PLUTO—4.648; 4.754; (shot by Cupid) 5.606; 5.887.

DÔ·RIS: wife of Nereus, mother of the Nereïds—2.13; 2.387; 13.1181.

DRY·OP·E: daughter of Eurytus, sister of Iole—(her story) 9.529 ff.; (transformed) 9.561 ff.

EARTH: 1.16; (formation) 1.40 ff.; (creation of human beings) 1.113; (abandoned by Astraea) 1.207; (produces new human life) 1.218; (the Furies) 1.346; 1.358; (the Flood) 1.414; (life after the Flood) 1.606; 1.632; (Pytho) 1.638; 2.9; 2.18; (Phaëton); (complains to Jupiter) 2.392 ff.; (in darkness) 4.293; (Pluto) 5.661; (Arêthusa) 5.765, 5.780; (Niobe) 6.311; (produces armed men) 7.212; (Medea) 7.320; (Antaeus) 9.299; (on shield) 13.483; 15.111; 15.125; 15.138; 15.515.

ÉCH·O: a nymph—3.546; (Juno) 3.556; (Narcissus) 3.568 ff., 3.754 ff.; 3.774.

E·GÉ·RÍA: a nymph, wife of Numa—15.719; (mourns) 15.726; (transformed) 15.825.

É·LÍS: a city and region in the western Peloponnese—(Apollo) 2.1010; (Arêthusa) 5.757; 5.769; 5.948; 8.489; (Hercules) 9.305; 12.847; (games) 14.504.

É·NÎ·PE·US: a river in Thessaly—1.849; (Neptune) 6.189; (Medea) 7.369.

ÉPH·Ý·RE: old name for the city of CORINTH on the Isthmus—2.348; (Medea) 7.621.

É·RÉ·BUS: another name for the Underworld—5.847; 10.121; 14.622.

ERYMANTHUS: a mountain and river in Arcadia—(overheats) 2.353; (Arcas) 2.734; (Arthusa) 5.948.

ETHIOPIA/ETHIOPIANS (e): region in northern Africa—(Phaëthon) 1.1152; (turn black) 2.340; (Perseus) 4.991; (royal feast) 4.1136, 5.3 ff.; 15.480.

EURÝDICE: wife of Orpheus—(Orpheus) 10.12 ff.; (dies again) 10.78 ff.; (reunited with Orpheus) 11.93.

GÁNYMEDE (e): young prince of Troy—(Jupiter) 10.231 ff.; 11.1152.

GIANTS: divine monsters—(war on heaven) 1.209 ff.; 1.258; 5.509; 10.223.

GOLDEN FLEECE: 6.1167; 7.13; (Jason takes it) 7.249, 7.256.

HAR'MÔ'NIA: daughter of Venus and Mars, wife of Cadmus—3.202; (an exile) 4.844 ff.; (transformed) 4.876 ff.

HÈL'ÈNUS: son of Priam, a prophet—13.162; (captured) 13.550; (Aeneas) 13.1149 ff.; (Aeneas) 15.653; 15.672.

HÈL'I'A'DES: daughters of the Sun (Apollo)—(grieve for Phaëton, are transformed) 2.491 ff.; (Orpheus) 10.141; 10.397.

HÈL'I'OS: son of Hyperion, Greek god of the Sun. See APOLLO. (love for Leucothoe) 4.280 ff.; 13.1507.

HÈR'MÀF'RO'DI'TUS: son of Hermes (Mercury) and Aphrodite (Venus)—(his story) 4.423 ff.; (is transformed and drowns) 4.542 ff.

HÈR'SÈ: daughter of Cecrops—(Erichthonius and Pallas) 2.824; (Mercury) 2.1080 ff.

HÈS'O'NE: daughter of Laomedon—(saved by Hercules) 11.322; (Telamon) 11.336.

HÈS'PÈ'RFE: daughter of Cebrenus—(Aesacus) 11.171 ff.; (killed by snake) 11.181 ff.
Glossary and Index

Hip·pod·a·mia: bride of Pirithous—12.329; (abducted and rescued) 12.350 ff.; 14.1024.

Hip·pó·ly·tus: son of Theseus—(his story) 15.735 ff.; (changes name) 15.818; 15.832.

Hip·pó·mè·nes: son of Megareus—(Atalanta) 10.872 ff.; (transformed) 10.1060.

Hunger (e): (Ceres) 8.1217 ff.; (her home) 8.1241; (obeys Ceres) 8.1263 ff.

Hy·a·cín·thus: a lad from Amyclae—(Apollo) 10.242 ff.; (transformed) 10.315 ff.; 13.649.

Hy·dra: a monster with many heads—(poison blood) 2.969; (heads) 9.113, 9.121; (Nessus’ shirt) 9.210; 9.261; 9.312.

Hy·ló·nó·me: a female centaur—(Cyllarus) 12.629 ff.; (kills herself) 12.660.

Hy·mèn: god of marriage—1.702; 4.1130; 6.701; 9.1219; 9.1224; 9.1269; (Orpheus) 10.1.

Hy·rè·né: mother of Cyncus (2), also a lake in Boeotia—(Medea) 7.586; (transformed) 7.603 ff.

I·án·the: daughter of Telestes—(Iphis) 9.1141 ff.

I·a·pyg·i·a: region in southern Italy—(Diomedes) 14.701; 14.778; 15.83; 15.1065.

Íc·á·rus: son of Daedalus—(with Daedalus) 8.315 ff.; (drowns) 8.360.

Ída: mountain near Troy—(on fire) 2.316; 4.405; 4.424; 4.30; 7.568; (Laethea) 10.114; 11.1162; 12.803; 13.536; 14.818.

Ín·a·chus: a river in Argolis, father of Io—(grieving) 1.856; (with transformed Io) 1.945 ff.

Íno: daughter of Cadmus, wife of Athamas—(Bacchus) 3.481; (Pentheus) 3.1098; (Juno) 4.614 ff.; (Tisiphone) 4.721 ff.; (jumps in the sea) 4.780; (transformed) 4.799; (companions changed) 4.804 ff.

Ío: daughter of Inachus—(Jupiter) 1.859 ff.; (transformed and suffers) 1.900 ff.; (at the Nile, transformed back) 1.1072 ff.; (son with Jupiter) 1.1100; 2.773; (as Isis) 9.1090.

Ío·lá·us: son of Iphicles—(Great Boar Hunt) 8.491; (made young) 9.629, 9.690.

Iónian Sea: part of the Mediterranean between Greece and Italy—(Myscelus) 15.79; 15.1060.
GLOSSARY AND INDEX

IPH'GE'NE'IA: daughter of Agamemnon—(at Aulis) 12.47; 13.305; 13.322.

Í·PHIS (1): daughter of Telethusa and Ligdus—(her story) 9.1061 ff.; (transformed) 9.1255.

Í·PHIS (2): a man from Cyprus—(his story) 14.1069; (kills himself) 14.1098 ff.

Í·RIS: daughter of Thaumas, divine messenger—(in the Flood) 1.393; (purifies Juno) 4.709; (Juno) 11.908 ff.; (Sleep) 11.950 ff.; 14.128; (Hersilia) 14.1278 ff.

IRON AGE: 1.176 ff.; 15.391.

Í·TYS: son of Procris and Tereus—(birth) 6.710; 6.716; (killed) 6.104 ff.

IXION: father of Nessus and Pirithoüs and the centaurs—(in the Underworld) 4.682, 4.688; 9.202; (Orpheus) 10.68.

JÁ·SON: son of Aeson—(leads Argonauts) 7.9; (Æetes) 7.12 ff.; (Medea) 7.19 ff.; 7.132 ff.; (tested by Aeetes) 7.184 ff.; (Golden Fleece) 7.244 ff.; (Iolchos) 7.259; (Medea and Aeson) 7.269 ff.; 7.407; (Medea’s revenge) 7.625; (Great Boar Hunt) 8.481, 8.549; 8.646.

JOVE (E): another name for JUPITER.

JÚ·NO: sister and wife of Jupiter—(Iris) 1.394; (suspicious of Jupiter and Io) 1.887 ff.; (Argus) 1.923; (Argus’ eyes) 1.1063; (torments Io) 1.1068; (forgives Io) 1.1080 ff.; 2.635; (Callisto) 2.683 ff.; (Tethys and Oceanus) 2.747 ff.; (Semele) 3.379 ff.; (Teiresias) 3.490 ff.; (Echo) 3.556; 3.788; (Ino) 4.619 ff.; (Underworld) 4.662 ff.; 4.774; (Ino’s companions) 4.812; (Typhon) 5.526; (Pygmy queen) 6.148; (Antigone) 6.153; 6.347; (Latona) 6.551; 6.702; (plague) 7.821; 8.356; 9.27; (hatred for Hercules) 9.36; 9.221 ff.; 9.417; (delays Hercules’ birth) 9.460 ff.; (incest) 9.805; 9.1218; 9.1268; (Ganymede) 10.241; 11.899; (sends Iris to Sleep) 11.905 ff.; (Ixion) 12.780; (Hecuba) 13.926; 14.129; 14.886; 14.902; (opens gates of Rome) 14.1202; (Hersilia) 14.1277; 15.248; 15.575; 15.1063; 15.1171.

JÚ·PITER: son of Saturn, husband of Juno, chief Olympian god—1.150; (rules after Saturn) 1.159; (creates seasons) 1.162; (Giants) 1.212; (summons gods) 1.233 ff.; (Lycaon) 1.297 ff.; (sends the Flood) 1.367 ff.; (ends the Flood) 1.472; (Io) 1.865 ff.; (Mercury) 1.987 ff.; (Juno and Io) 1.1079 ff.; 2.88; (Phaëthon) 2.440 ff.; (Cynus) 2.546; 2.565; (calms Apollo) 2.576; (Callisto) 2.596 ff.; 2.696; 2.705; 2.717; (Callisto and Arcas) 2.741; (Mercury and Europa) 2.1240 ff.; 3.1; 3.12; (Semele) 3.437 ff.; (Bacchus) 3.478; (Teiresias) 3.487 ff.; 3.788; (Celmis) 4.412; (Perseus) 4.947 ff.; (J. Ammon) 4.993; (Danaë) 4.1033; 4.1123; 5.30; (Typhon) 5.520; (Ceres) 5.798 ff.; (Ceres and Pluto) 5.878; (in Minerva’s tapestry) 6.121; (in Arachne’s tapestry) 6.167 ff.; (Telchines) 7.581; (Aegina) 7.914; 7.956 ff.; (Crete) 8.157; (Minos) 8.245; (visits Philemon and Baucis) 8.984 ff.; (Hercules) 9.388 ff.; (Capanesus) 9.641; (Callirhoë)

LAM’PE’TIasbourg: sister of Phaëton, one of the Heliades: (transformed) 2.503.

LA’ÓM’EDON: founder of Troy—6.154; 11.296; (Apollo, Neptune, Hercules) 11.302 ff.; 11.1153.

LÁ’TI’UM: region of central Italy where Rome was built—(brides) 2.529; 14.506; 14.603; 14.690; (Pomona) 14.949; (Numa) 15.718; (Cipus) 15.880; (disease) 15.948.

LA’TO’NA: daughter of Coeus, divine mother of Apollo and Diana—(call to worship) 6.268 ff.; (insulted by Niobe) 6.287 ff.; (anger at Niobe) 6.342 ff.; (Lycian peasants) 6.516 ff.; (gives birth) 6.540 ff.; (Calaurea) 7.611; (birth tree) 13.1017.

LÉL’EGES: original inhabitants of parts of Greece and Asia Minor—7.699; (Minos) 8.9; (Byblis) 9.1029.

LÉ’LEX: a warrior from Troezen—(Boar Hunt) 8.493; (with Acheloüs) 8.888, (Baucis and Philemon) 8.970 ff.; 8.1135.

LÉM’NOS: an island in the Aegean Sea—2.1132; (Vulcan) 4.269; (Philoctetes) 13.77; 13.517; (Ulysses) 13.653.

LÉ’THE: river of the underworld—7.251; (in Cave of Sleep) 11.933.

LEU’CÓN’Œ: one of the daughters of Minyas—4.244 ff.; 4.395; (transformed) 4.595 ff.

LEU’CÓTH’Œ: daughter of Orchamus—(Apollo) 4.285 ff.; (buried alive and transformed) 4.348 ff.

LÍ’CHAS: servant of Hercules—(Nessus’ shirt) 9.255; (killed and transformed) 9.341 ff.

LÚ’CÍ’FER: morning star, father of Ceyx—2.168; 2.1078; 4.932; 4.983; 8.1; 11.147; (Ceyx) 11.425; 11.467; 11.871; (mourns) 11.887; 15.289; 15.1192.

LY’CA’É’US: mountain in Arcadia: 1.309; (Pan and Syrinx) 1.1033; 2.1060; (Atalanta) 8.504.
LYCÁON: king of Arcadia, father of Callisto—(Jupiter) 1.230, 1.279; 1.297 ff.; (transformed) 1.331 ff.; 2,728; 2.776.

LYDIA: an inland country in Asia Minor—(Arachne) 6.22; 6.242; (Midas) 11.149.

MAEÁNDER: a river in Asia Minor—(overheats) 2.355; 8.260; (Cyane) 9.720.

MAEÁLUS: a mountain in Arcadia—1.307; 2.606; 2.646; 5.947.

MAÉÖNIA: an alternative name for LYDIA—2.364; 3.892; (Arachne) 6.8; (Niobe) 6.248.

MAÊSTRA: daughter of Erisichthon—8.1315 ff.; (transformed) 8.1326 ff.

MÁRS: son of Juno and Jupiter, god of war—(sacred Serpent) 3.50; (Cadmus) 3.200; (Venus) 4.250 ff.; (his rock) 6.116; (Tereus) 6.698; 12.142; (Romulus) 14.1201; (petitions Jupiter) 14.1241; (brings Romulus to heaven) 14.1258 ff.; 15.1314.

MÁRSYAS: a satyr—(Apollo) 6.625 ff.; (river) 6.654.

MÉDEA: daughter of Aeëtes—(Jason) 7.18 ff.; (Hecate) 7.128 ff.; (Iolchos) 7.259; (Aeson) 7.269 ff.; (Incantation) 7.313 ff.; (Bacchus) 7.464; (daughters of Pelias) 7.467 ff.; (stabs Pelias) 7.553; (flies over islands) 7.556 ff.; (revenge) 7.625; (Aegeus) 7.632 ff.; (Theseus) 7.644 ff.

MÉDUSA: one of the Gorgons—(her head) 4.918; (transforms Atlas) 4.972; (transforms sea weed) 4.1106; (killed by Perseus) 4.1164 ff.; (birth of Pegasus) 4.1168; (seduced by Neptune) 4.1177 ff.; 5.114; (head used by Perseus) 5.286 ff.; 5.383; 5.392 ff.; 6.195.

Glossary and Index

MÉR’CU’RY: divine son of Jupiter and Maia—(Argus) 1.990 ff.; (Syrinx) 1.1017 ff.; (Argus) 1.1057; (Battus) 2.1018 ff.; (Herse) 2.1055 ff.; (helps Jupiter) 2.1236 ff.; (Hermes) 4.425; (grants Hermaphroditus’ request) 4.570; 4.1121 ff.; (fears Typhoëus) 5.528; (Philemon and Baucis) 8.986 ff.; (Chione) 11.480 ff.; (links to Ulysses) 13.240; (helps Ulysses) 14.450.

MÍ’LÉ’TUÙS: son of Deione and Apollo, father of Caunus and Byblis—(Minos) 9.710 ff.; (Cyane) 9.720

MÍ’NÉR’VA: goddess of wisdom, divine daughter of Jupiter, also called PALLAS—(Erichthonius and Raven) 2.816 ff.; 2.870; (Aglauros and Envy) 2.1118 ff.; (Cadmus and dragon’s teeth) 3.145 ff.; 4.1122; (Medusa) 4.1188 ff.; (protects Perseus) 5.78; (visits Muses) 5.397 ff.; (Pierus’ daughters) 5.469 ff.; 5.594; (Muses) 6.1 ff.; (Arachne) 6.7, 6.43 ff.; (weaving) 6.116 ff.; (reed pipe) 6.629; (Perdix) 8.402 ff.; (Athens) 8.424; (Oeneus) 8.440; (Theseus) 12.560; (image stolen) 13.163, 13.553; 13.627; (Diomedes) 14.727; 15.535; 15.1074.

MÍ’NOS: son of Jupiter and Europa, king of Crete—(threatens war) 7.716 ff.; (visits Aeacus) 7.740 ff.; 7.789; (at war) 8.9; (Scylla) 8.37 ff.; (labyrinth) 8.243 ff.; (imprisons Minotaur) 8.251 ff.; 8.299; old and weak) 9.701 ff.; (Miletus) 9.709.

MÍN’O’TAUR: monster child of Pasiphaë—8.212; 8.251; (imprisoned) 8.272 ff.; (killed) 8.276.

MO’LÓS’-SI’-ANS:—a people of Epirus in Greece—(Lycaon) 1.325; (royal sons changed) 13.1144.

MÓP’SU:S: son of Ampycus, a Lapith—(Great Boar Hunt) 8.499, 8.553; (kills Hodites) 12.703; (see Caeneus transformed) 12.808 ff.;

MÚL’C’-BER: an alternative name for VULCAN. 2.7; 9.676.

MÚS’ES (E): daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne—2.318; (Minerva visits) 5.404 ff.; (Pyreneus) 5.435 ff.; (daughters of Pierus) 5.467 ff.; 6.2; (Orpheus) 10.219; 15.720; 15.940.

MÝR’MI’-DONS: people from northern Greece—(appear from ants) 7.994 ff.

MÝR’RHA: daughter of Cinyras—(her story) 10.473 ff.; (transformed) 10.754.
MY·SCEL·US: son of Alemon—(Hercules and Crotona) 15.31 ff.

NAR·CI·SUS: son of Lirope and Cephus—(birth) 3.532; (Echo) 3.549 ff.; (in love) 3.634 ff.; (dies and is transformed) 3.737; (sisters’ lament) 3.771.

NAX·OS: island in the Cyclades—3.970, 3.975; 3.991; 3.1048.

NÉ·LE·US: king of Pylos, father of Nestor—2.1025; 6.682; (family killed) 12.850 ff.

NÉP·TUNE: divine brother of Jupiter, god of the sea—(aids the Flood) 1.400 ff.; (helps end the Flood) 1.482; (complains about Phaëton) 2.389; 2.421; (transforms Ino) 4.788 ff.; (seduces Medusa) 4.1186; (in Minerva’s tapestry) 6.124; (in Arachne’s tapestry) 6.186; (transforms Perimele) 8.934 ff.; (saves Maestra) 8.1323 ff.; (Hippomenes) 10.914; (with Laomedon and Apollo at Troy) 11.306 ff.; 12.38; (Cycnus) 12.228; (Caenis) 12.308 ff.; (Neleus) 12.856; (asks Apollo to kill Achilles) 12.892 ff.; 13.1339.

NÉ·RE·IDS: daughters of Doris and Nereus, nymphs of the sea—1.438; 5.29; 11.572; 13.1405; 14.405.

NÉ·RE·US: a god of the sea, father of the Nereids—1.265; 2.387; 11.572; 12.147; 13.1180.

NÉS·SU: son of Ixion, a centaur—(with Hercules) 9.164 ff.; (dies) 9.208 ff.; 9.252; (Lapiths) 12.481; (kills Cymelus) 12.701.

NILE (E): main river of Egypt—1.615; (Io) 1.1072; (overheats) 2.366; (Nileus) 5.299; 5.515; (Isis) 9.1238; (Caesar) 15.1140.

NI·O·BE: daughter of Tantalus, wife of Amphion, king of Thebes—(her pride) 6.246 ff.; (children killed) 6.365 ff.; (transformed) 6.493 ff.

NIS·US: king of Megara, father of Scylla (i)—(purple hair) 8.12 ff.; (hair stolen) 8.132; (transformed) 8.231 ff.

NO·NÁC·RIS: mountain in Arcadia—(Syrinx) 1.1019; (Callisto) 2.596.
NU'MA: king of Rome—15.5 ff.; (king) 15.716; (death) 15.723.

O'CE'A'NUS: a sea god, husband of Tethys—(Juno visits) 2.750 ff.; (incest) 9.804; (Glaucus) 13.1481.

O'CYRHO'E: daughter of Chiron and Chariclo—(prophecy) 2.945 ff.; (transformed) 2.989.

O'NEUS: king of Calydon, father of Meleager and Deianira—(Diana) 8.436 ff.; 8.761; (mourns Meleager) 8.828; (Acheloüs) 9.18.

O'ETA: mountain range in northern Greece—1.457; (burns) 2.316; (Hercules) 9.272, 9.331; (Hercules’ death) 9.372; 9.400.

OLYMPIAN GODS: the major divine figures—(meet with Jupiter) 1.234 ff.; (calm Apollo) 2.573; (run from Typhoeus) 5.510 ff.; (on Minerva’s tapestry) 6.119.

OLYMPUS: mountain in northern Greece—(smashed by Jupiter) 1.214; 1.302; 2.85; (on fire) 2.328; (Medea) 7.363; 13.1208.

OR'IHY'IA: daughter of Erechtheus—(Boreas) 6.111 ff.; 7.1083.

OR'PHÆUS: son of Oeagrus and Calliope—(Euridice) 10.4 ff.; (Underworld) 10.16 ff.; (loses Euridice again) 10.91 ff.; (love of boys) 10.131; (sings to trees) 10.138 ff.; (attacked and killed) 11.1 ff.; (mourned) 11.66 ff.; (his head) 11.74 ff.; (finds Euridice) 11.90; 11.140.

OR'TYG'IA (1): another name for the island of Delos. 1.1025; 15.506.

OR'TYG'IA (2): an island off Syracuse—5.776; 5.995.

ÓSA: mountain in northern Greece—(smashed by Jupiter) 1.215; (on fire) 2.327; (Medea) 7.362; 12.498.

ÓTHRYS: mountain in northern Greece—(burns) 2.322; (Medea) 7.363, 7.560; (Caeneus) 12.272; (stripped of trees) 12.792.

PAG'A'SÆ: town in Thessaly where the Argonauts’ boat was built—7.1; 12.642; 13.38.
PA·LÆ·MON: god of the sea—(once Melicertes) 4.803; 13.1434.

PA·LÆ·MÉ·DES: son of Nauplius, Greek warrior leader—(exposes Ulysses) 13.62; 13.90, 13.94; 13.511.

PÁL·A·TINE (E): one of Rome’s hills—14.519; 14.947; 14.1265; 15.844.

PA·LÁ·DI·UM: statue of Minerva in Troy—(stolen) 13.552 ff.; 13.627.

PA·LÁ·LAS: an alternative name for Minerva. (See MINERVA)

PA·N·CHA·É·A: island region of Arabia—10.468; (Myrrha) 10.737.

PA·N·DI·ON: king of Athens, father of Philomela and Procne—(with Tereus) 6.698, 6.733 ff.; 6.793 ff.; (dies) 6.1100.

PA·N·DRO·SUS: daughter of Cecrops—(Erichthonius) 2.824; 2.1102.

PA·PHOS: city in Cyprus and boy born there—(Pygmalion) 10.441; 10.451 ff.; 10.813.

PA·R·IS: son of Priam and Hecuba—(burial site) 7.571; 12.5; (Apollo) 12.1016 ff.; 13.330; 13.335; 13.812; 15.1215.

PA·R·NÁS·SUS: mountain near Delphi—(Deucalion) 1.460; (Cupid) 1.682; (on fire) 2.321; (Themis) 4.951; (Muses) 5.441; 11.253; (Daedalion) 11.539.

PA·ROS: island in the Cyclades: 3.642; (Minos) 7.731; (Daedalus) 8.357.

PA·SÍPH·Ã·E: wife of Minos, mother of the Minotaur—8.210, 8.217; 8.249; 9.1178.

PE·GÁ·SUS: winged horse—(birth) 4.1168; (makes new spring) 5.409 ff.

PE·LI·AS: half-brother of Aeson—(his daughters and Medea) 7.471 ff.; 7.519; (killed) 7.537 ff.

PE·LI·ON: mountain in northern Greece—(smashed by Jupiter) 1.215; (Medea) 7.362, 7.559; (Achilles' spear) 12.115; (stripped of trees) 12.793; 13.179.
Glossary and Index

Pêlôps: son of Tantalus, brother of Niobe—(his ivory shoulder) 6.660 ff.; 8.980.

Pênéus: river in Thessaly, father of Daphne—1.660; (Daphne) 1.703 ff.; 1.802; (his home) 1.837; (overheats) 2.352; (Medea) 7.370.

Pênthéus: son of Echion and Agave, king of Thebes—(Teiresias) 3.784 ff.; (Bacchus and Acoetes) 3.811 ff.; (killed) 3.1051 ff.; 4.33; 4.635.

Per’tclym’énes: a son of Neleus, brother of Nestor—(transformed, killed) 12.855 ff.

Per’tmé-le: daughter of Hippodamas—(transformed) 8.927 ff.

Per’séph’one: see Proserpine.

Phâ’éton: son of Apollo and Clymene: (wonders about his father) 1.1106 ff.; (Apollo and the horses of the Sun) 2.24 ff.; (killed by Jupiter) 2.450 ff.; 2.462 ff.; (epitaph) 2.474; 2.532; 4.362; 12.896.

Phâ’éthû’sa: eldest sister of Phaëton, one of the Heliades—(transformed) 2.501.

Phlég’éthon: a river of the Underworld—5.850; 15.799.

Phô’cis: region in central Greece—1.455; 2.843; 5.438; 11.552.
GLOSSARY AND INDEX

PHŒ-CUS: son of Aeacus—(with Minos) 7.749; 7.1041 ff.; 7.1248; (killed by Peleus) 11.421; 11.603.

PHŒ-BÈ (1): a Titan, the moon—1.15; 2.1079.

PHŒ-BÈ (2): an alternative name for DIANA—1.697; 2.605.

PHŒ-BUS: another name for APOLLON.

PICUS: son of Saturn—(statue) 14.483; (his story) 14.495 ff.; (transformed) 14.595; (companions transformed) 14.612 ff.

PIÈ-RUS: king of Emathia—(his daughters and the Muses) 5.467 ff.; (story of Typhoëus) 5.511 ff.; (daughters transformed) 5.1044.

PIN-DUS: a mountain in Thessaly—1.838; (on fire) 2.328; (Medea) 7.363; 11.860.

PI-RÝH-O-US: son of Ixion—(Great Boar Hunt) 8.482; 8.634; (with Acheloüs) 8.886; (ridicules Acheloüs) 8.961; (wedding feast, fight with Centaurs) 12.328 ff.; (kills Centaurs) 12.515 ff.

PLEI-ADES: daughters of Atlas and Pleione, now a constellation—(Maia) 1.990; (Niobe) 6.291; (on shield) 13.484.

PLÛ-TO: brother of Jupiter and Neptune, god of the Underworld, also called Dis—(alarmed by earth opening up) 2.376; 3.441; 5.565; (shot by Cupid) 5.569 ff.; (Proserpine) 5.620 ff.; (Cyane) 5.645 ff.; 5.790; (Jupiter defends him) 5.819 ff.; 5.880 ff.; (Medea) 7.398; (Orpheus) 10.24, 10.76; (Aeneas) 14.179; (Hippolytus) 15.805.

PÔL-LUX: son of Tyndareus and Leda—(Great Boar Hunt) 8.479, 8.587.

POLYXENA: daughter of Priam and Hecuba—(sacrificed) 13.729 ff.; (Hecuba laments her death) 13.800 ff.

POLYNA: a hamadryad in Latium—(her story) 14.948 ff.

PROCRIS: daughter of Erechtheus, wife of Cephalus—6.1109; (with Cephalus) 7.1082 ff.; (killed) 7.1318 ff.

PROETUS: brother of Acrisius—(turned to stone) 5.378; 15.491.

PROPOETUS: (his daughters)—10.334, 10.359 ff.

PROSERPINE (E): daughter of Ceres and Jupiter, also called Persephone—(alarmed at earth opening up) 2.377; (abducted by Pluto) 5.615 ff.; (her belt) 5.731; 5.786; 5.828; (and pomegranate seeds) 5.835 (transforms Ascalaphus) 5.847; (companions transformed) 5.866; (divides her year) 5.881; (seduced by Jupiter) 6.185; (Medea) 7.399; (Orpheus visits) 10.24, 10.75; 10.1105; (Avernian Juno) 14.177.

PROTEUS: a sea god—2.11; (changes shape) 8.1144 ff.; (with Thetis) 11.346; (Peleus) 11.392 ff.; 13.1464.

PYGMALION: a young man of Cyprus—(his story) 10.368 ff.

PYLOS: city in the southwest Peloponnese—(Apollo) 2.1017; 6.681; 8.576; 12.847.

PYRAMUS: a young lad of Babylon—(Thisbe) 4.85 ff.; (kills himself) 4.178 ff.

PYRENES: king of Thrace—(Muses) 5.435 ff.; (kills himself) 5.458.

PYRHA: daughter of Epimetheus, wife of Deucalion—(survives the Flood) 1.464; (restores human life) 1.508 ff.

PYTHAGORAS: a Greek philosopher—15.94 ff.; (teachings) 15.101 ff.; (vegetarianism) 15.114 ff.; (immortality and migration of souls) 15.231 ff.; (geological changes) 15.389 ff.; (Aetna)
GLOSSARY AND INDEX

15.512 ff.; (spontaneous generation) 15.541 ff.; (phoenix) 15.583; (strange animals) 15.607 ff.; (civilizations) 15.626; (Rome’s destiny) 15.641 ff.

QUIRINUS: Romulus’ name once he becomes a god—14.1275; 15.1284; 15.1308.

RAVEN: a bird associated with Apollo—(changes colour) 2.789; (Crow) 2.803 ff.; (informs on Coronis) 2.882 ff.; (punished with change of colour) 2.934.

RHÉGÉUM: city in Italy across the sea from Sicily—14.7; 14.72.

RHÓDÔPE: mountain in Thrace—(burns) 2.322; (once a mortal) 6.143; 6.965; (Orpheus) 10.122.

ROME (E): (founded) 14.1192; (Venus saves the city) 14.1198; (Tatius) 14.1238; (Numa) 15.1; (Pythagoras) 15.641 ff.; (Cipus) 15.904; (Aesculapius) 15.947 ff.; 15.1142; 15.1336.

RUMOUR:—(Deianira) 9.225; (home) 12.62 ff.; 12.97.

SÁLMACHIS: a nymph and a pool—(her story) 4.418 ff.; (drowns) 4.544 ff.; 15.479.

SÁ’MOS: island off Asia Minor—(Daedalus) 8.355; (Pythagoras) 15.94.

SÁ’TURN: father of Jupiter, Juno, and others—(in Tartarus) 1.158; (in Arachne’s weaving) 6.207; (incest) 9.803; 15.1304.

SCYLA (1): daughter of Nisus—(Minos) 8.27 ff.; (Nisus’ hair) 8.127 ff.; (transformed) 8.236.

SCÝTHIA: northern regions generally—1.92; (on fire) 2.325; 5.1012; 7.646; (Hunger) 8.1223; 8.1237; 10.892; (Diana) 14.514; 15.427; 15.537.

SÉMÈLE: daughter of Cadmus, mother of Bacchus—(Juno and Jupiter) 3.388 ff.; (killed) 3.471.

SICILY: 5.550; (Ceres punishes the island) 5.722 ff.; (Arethusa) 5.770; 7.112; 8.455; (Aeneas) 13.1154; (Telemus) 13.1220; (Glaucus) 14.10; (Aeneas) 14.126; 15.416; (Aesculapius) 15.1070; (Pompey) 15.1252.

SILÈN‘US: a satyr and companion of Bacchus—4.40; (Midas and Bacchus) 11.135, 11.150 ff.

SILVER AGE: 1.159 ff.

SIRENS (E): transformed daughters of Acheloüs—(transformation) 5.865 ff.; (Aeneas) 14.133.

SLEEP: god of sleep—11.909; (his home) 11.917 ff.; (Iris) 11.952 ff.; (with Morpheus) 11.977 ff.

SPER·CHÆ‘US: a river in Thessaly—1.850; (overheats) 2.361; 5.139; (Medea) 7.370.

STYX: (also STYGIAN SHADES) a river of the Underworld—1.194; 1.267; 1.1085; 2.62; 2.149; 3.409; 3.441; (Narcissus) 3.771; 3.1057; 4.642 ff.; 5.185; (Arethusa) 5.784; 6.1082; (Orpheus visits) 10.19; 10.115; 10.478; 10.1058; 11.782; 12.502; 13.755; 14.242; 14.899; 15.232; 15.1195.

SUN: see APOLLO.¹

SY·RINX: a hamadryad—1.1021 ff.; (Pan) 1.1031 ff.; (transformed) 1.1041.

TAN·TA·LUS: son of Jupiter, father of Pelops and Niobe—(in the Underworld) 4.678; (Niobe) 6.289; 6.397; (cuts up his son) 6.666; (Orpheus) 10.67; 12.1066.

TAR·PÆ·A: Roman girl who betrayed the citadel—14.1194 ff.; 15.1319.

TAR·TA·RUS: deepest pit in the Underworld or the Underworld generally—(Saturn) 1.158; (cracks open) 2.375; 5.587; 5.662; 6.1101; 10.34; 11.1027; 12.404; 12.808; 12.1051.

¹Ovid normally identifies the Sun with Apollo (or Phoebus) but at times, following Greek traditions, he will refer to the Sun as a Titan or the son of Hyperion. In this index almost all references to the Sun and the god of the Sun are listed under Apollo.
TE·RÉ·SI·AS: a prophet in Thebes—(Jupiter and Juno) 3.494 ff.; (Lirope and Narcissus) 3.521 ff.; (his fame) 3.781; (Pentheus) 3.781 ff.

TÉ·LÁ·MON: son of Aeacus, brother of Peleus—(with Minos) 7.746 ff.; (Myrmidons) 7.1007 ff.; 7.1042, 8.4; (Great Boar Hunt) 8.489, 8.596 ff.; (Hesione) 11.333; 11.337; 13.35; 13.250.

TE·LE·THÚ·SA: wife of Ligdus, mother of Iphis—9.1068 ff.

TÉ·MPE: a valley in Thessaly—1.836; 7.358; (Cycnus) 7.587.

TÉN·E·DOS: island near Troy—(Apollo) 1.758; (Achilles) 12.170; 13.285.

TE·RE·US: king of Thrace, husband of Proce—(Athens) 6.693; (Procne) 6.696 ff.; (Philomela) 6.746 ff.; (transformed) 6.1094; 6.115.

TÉ·THYS: a sea goddess, wife of Oceanus—2.9 6; (Phaëton) 2.227; (Juno visits) 2.750 ff.; (incest) 9.804; (Aesacus) 11.1197; (Glaucus) 13.1481.

TEÚ·CER (1): early king of Troy—(founder of Aeneas’ line) 13.1123.

TEÚ·CER (2): son of Telamon, half-brother of Ajax (1), Greek warrior—13.257.

THÉ·BES: main city of Boeotia—(building) 3.198; 3.83; 3.84; 3.864; (Bacchus) 4.613; (Cadmus leaves) 4.841; (Minerva) 5.403; 6.265; (Niobe) 6.299, 6.36; 6.673 ff.; (monstrous fox) 7.1200; (Alcmene) 9.488; (war prophesied) 9.640; 13.1087; (Anius’ bowl) 13.1094 ff.; 15.636 ff.

THÉ·MIS: goddess of justice—(Deucalion and Pyrrha) 1.467, 1.54; (prophecy to Atlas) 4.952; (the fox) 7.117; (prophesies) 9.638 ff.

THÉ·TIS: daughter of Proteus, a sea goddess, mother of Achilles—11.337; (Proteus and Peleus) 11.346 ff.; (Jupiter) 11.355; (Psamathe) 11.63; (hides Achilles) 13.265; 13.477.

THIS·BE: a young girl of Babylon—(Pyramus) 4.85 ff.; (kills herself) 4.236.
Thrâce (e): region to the northeast of Greece—6.143; (Tereus) 6.693; 6.711; 10.82; 11.128; 13.715; (Hecuba) 13.923; (Polydorus) 13.1007.

Tî·ber: river through Rome—(overheats) 2.372; 14.650; 14.683; (name) 14.939; 15.642; (home for Aesculapius) 15.945, 15.1102, 15.1116.

Tî·spîh·ō·ne or Tî·spîh·ōne (e): one of the Furies—(obeys Juno) 4.701 ff.; (Ino and Athamas) 4.711 ff.

Tî·y·os: monstrous son of Jupiter—(Underworld) 4.676; (Orpheus) 10.70.

Tle·pôl·ē·mus: son of Hercules—(with Nestor) 12.828 ff.

Tmô·lus: a mountain in Lydia—(burns) 2.316; 6.25; (Bacchus) 11.130; (Pan and Apollo) 11.230 ff.; 11.295.

Tôx·ē·us: son of Thestius, uncle of Meleager—(Great Boar Hunt) 8.482; (killed) 8.678 ff.

Trà·chis: a city in Thessaly—(Ceyx) 11.424; 11.784; 11.965.

Trip·tôl·ē·mus: son of Celeus—(Ceres sends him away) 5.1005 ff.; (Lyncus) 5.1013 ff.

Tri·ton: a sea god—(helps end the Flood) 1.483 ff.; 2.11; 13.1434.

Troé·zen: town in the Peloponnese—6.682; (Lelex) 8.888; 15.442; 15.764.

Ty·phō·e·us: a monstrous giant—3.464; (fights gods) 5.511 ff.; (held underground) 5.552 ff.

Ty·rē (E): city in Asia Minor—2.1255; 3.55; 3.822; 6.103; 15.429.

Ty·rēn·i·an: a name applied to certain non-Greek people from Asia Minor who moved into Italy—3.880; 3.1058; 4.36; 15.834.
GLOSSARY AND INDEX

UNDERWORLD: 2.376; (Juno visits) 4.639 ff.; (Orpheus) 10.16 ff.; (Aeneas) 14.178.

U'RÁ'NI'A: one of the Muses—5.413 ff.; (daughters of Pierus) 5.1039 ff.

VÉ'NUS: goddess of love, wife of Mars, mother of Aeneas—(Cadmus) 3.200; (Mars) 4.250 ff.; (Aphrodite) 4.425; (Hermaphroditus) 4.570; (Ino) 4.785 ff.; (fears Typhoëus) 5.527; (Cupid) 5.576 ff.; (Anchises) 9.678; 9.1268; (Cerastes and daughters of Propoetus) 10.344 ff.; (Pygmalion) 10.410 ff.; (Adonis) 10.803 ff.; 10.968; (Hippomenes) 10.974 ff.; (Adonis) 10.1089 ff.; (Circe) 14.38; (Diomedes) 14.730 ff.; (transforms crew) 14.758 ff.; 14.870; (petitions gods) 14.891 ff.; (Idalian Venus) 14.1062; (Venus Prospiciens) 14.1169; (saves Rome) 14.1205 ff.; (Caesar) 15.1152 ff.; (Jupiter) 15.1219 ff.

VER'TÚM'NUS: god of the seasons—(Pomona) 14.976 ff.

VÉS'TA/VÉS'TAL VIRGINS: priestesses of Vesta, goddess of fire—15.1106; 15.1177; 15.1315.

VÚL'CAN: god of fire and the forge, husband of Venus, also called MULCIBER—2.7; 2.157; (Mars and Venus) 4.253 ff.; (Erichthonius) 9.678; (Achilles) 12.1042.

XÁN'THUS: river near Troy—(overheats) 2.354; (Byblis) 9.1031.

ZÁN'CLE: another name for Messana in Sicily—13.1163; 14.6; 14.73; 15.435.